Labour split on Europe revealed

JOHN RENTOUL Political Correspondent

The Labour Party is facing the same deep divisions over Europe as the Tories, according to an authoritative survey that reveals for the first time the scale of opposition in the party to further European integration.

Labour MPs are generally said to be more pro-European than Conservatives, but the survey highlights the scale of dissent that Tony Blair will have to face when he becomes prime

The findings show that Labour MPs are evenly divided over giving further powers to EU institutions, and a strong anti-European hard core - 21 per cent - believes that a single European currency would mean "the end of the UK as a sover-

The sensitivity of the study is underlined by the fact that Labour whips ordered MPs not to take part as soon as they heard it was under way. But the research team, led by Professor Andrew Gamble of Sheffield University, still managed between November 1995 and February this year to interview a politically balanced sample of a third of Labour MPs - including front-benchers. Two years ago, Professor Gamble, a leading political scientist, produced a survey of Tory MPs which

- almost certainly after the British general election. Asked if the IGC should increase the supranational powers of EU institutions, 38 per cent of Labour MPs agreed and 38 per cent disagreed, with 24

The survey also suggests a gap between opinion on the backbenches and among Labour shadow ministers. which could pose dangers to a Blair government. Although 28 per cent of backbenchers think a single currency means the end of the UK, for example, none of the frontbenchers agreed.

There should be a national referendum before the UK

Another split is between older and younger MPs. in contrast to the Tories, Labour is becoming more pro-European, as a more EU-minded generation takes over. None of the 1987-1992 intake, for example, wants Britain to withdraw from the EU, against 15 per cent of toric switch between Labour and Tory parties, with the Tories now markedly more hostile to the EU than Labour MPs.

While 28 per cent of backbench Labour MPs said the single currency would mean the end of the UK as a sovereign nation, just over 50 per cent of backbench Tories agreed in the survey carried out two years ago.

Thirty per cent of Labour MPs agree "sovereignty cannot be pooled", but 60 per cent of Tories agreed.

And only 18 per cent of Labour MPs want an "Act of Supremacy" to assert explicitly the ultimate power of West-minster over EU law - compared with 56 per cent of Tory MPs two years ago. (The Labour figure falls to 7 per cent among new MPs those elected in 1987 or a single currency will be, should

The survey confirms the his- 1992 - and to zero among frontbenchers.)

Only a quarter of Labour MPs back the extreme Euro-sceptic demand that the European Commission should lose the right to initiate legislation - a position held by 61 per cent of Tories. Unlike the Tories. most Labour MPs have no objections to a single European army, although they want to retain Britain's veto in foreign and defence policy.

The survey suggests that Labour divisions could have influenced Mr Blair's decision not to match John Major's promise of a referendum on a single currency. While Labour backbenchers support the idea by 56-34 per cent, frontbenchers are opposed by 50-35 per cent.

The Labour leader has not yet decided what his attitude to many and France decide, early in 1998 to launch it on the Maastricht target date of 1 January 1999, Selling the idea to his MPs will be crucially dependent on economic circumstances, because nearly 80 per cent of Labour MPs say the UK should not seek to meet the convergence criteria "if the result is increased unemployment in Britain". And 31 per cent of backbenchers say "a single currency as set out in the Maastricht Treaty will institutionalise neo-liberal economic policy". Professor Gamble and Steve Ludlam at Sheffield, and David Baker and David Seawright at Nottingham Trent university interviewed 90 of Labour's 271 MPs (now 272 after the Staffordshire South East byelection), including 29 frontmy continued yesterday with fig-ures showing an unexpected fall in unemployment last month.

However, the latest confirmation that the economy is reviving dashed hopes of further reductions in the cost of borrowing Eddie George, Gover-nor of the Bank of England, warned that interest rates might have to rise if demand continues to accelerate.

The number of people claiming unemployment benefit fell to its lowest level for nearly five years last month. The headline jobiess total dropped unex-pectedly by 27,500, falling be-low 2.2 million for the first time since April 1991.

Mr George, speaking on Chancellor Kenneth Clarke's home turf, added his support to this new boost for the Government's hopes that it can go into the general election with the economy in good shape.

The prospects for sustained economic growth with continuing low inflation remain, for the time being, just about as encouraging as they have been for a very long time," he said in a speech to the Nottinghamshire Chamber of Commerce last night.

However, the Governor warned that it was essential to show a commitment to permanently low inflation. "Inflation certainly won't stay dead of its own accord," he said.

This echoed his comments in last month's meeting with Mr Clarke, at which the agreed to cut the cost of borrowing for the third time in four months. According to minutes of the meeting released yesterday, Mr George said there was a possi-bility that interest rates would have to rise if there was clearer evidence that the growth in output had begun to accelerate.

The City of London read this as a sign that there was little chance of a further cut in base The Government's favourable rates, as Mr Clarke will be eager them before the general election? A rise in the underlying growth of average earnings to 3.5 per cent in February, after seven months stuck at 3.25 per cent, pointed to the same conclusion. The International Monetary Fund agreed. Its latest economic forecasts, published yesterday, said that there was little room for interest-rate cuts in the United Kingdom. As a result, shares fell yesterday from the record they set after upbeat news about the state of the economy earlier in the week. The unemployment count has declined by 794,500 from its peak of just under 3 million in December 1992, and by 165,200 in the past 12 months. Last month's big fall more than reversed the small increase in joblessness in February, although the figures have been distorted by a strike at JobCentres and benefit offices. Government statisticians said the trend decline was about 10,000 a month. The more respected unemployment measure based on the quarterly Labour Force Survey showed a fall of 133,000 in the year to February.

The number of people in work rose by 118,000 in the three months to February, according to the LFS. Of these new jobs, 88,000 were part-time, and 75,000 of these parttimers were women.

Labour's employment spokesman, Michael Meacher, said there were 1.4 million people who had been forced into part-time or temporary jobs when they would have pre-ferred full-time work. "The Government cannot claim economic success while this waste of human resources continues on such a vast scale," he said.

Royal marriage is over in five minutes

REBECCA FOWLER

It was an inauspicious end to a decade of royal marriage, brought to a close in five minutes in a cramped courtroom with scaffolding outside. The Duke and Duchess of York began their divorce proceedings yesterday alongside 28 other couples, insisting they remained "the bestest of friends".

The hearing involved the couples' names being read out by a cheery clerk to Judge Gerald Angel, who also presided over the divorces of Camilla Parker-Bowles and the Princess Royal. Bottom of the list were their Royal Highnesses, the Yorks, case number 2662/96, whose wedding 10 years ago brought London to a standstill. £3bn borrowing excess.

Brian Mawhinney, the Tory chairman, was under fire from within his own ranks yesterday after an outburst in which he claimed that a BBC interviewer was urging the Tory party to "dump the Prime Minister

The row exposed tensions within the Tory high command in the wake of last Thursday's crushing defeat in the Staffordshire South East by-election as it emerged that John Major is ruling out both an early Cabitax-cutting agenda of the right.

While Mr Mawhinney later mounted a robust defence of his attack on the Today programme interviewer Sue MacGregor some senior Tory backbenchers privately accused him of a serious misjudgement. One prominent right-winger said his outburst was "crass" and "unprofessional"-not least because he, rather than Ms MacGregor, had explicitly raised the issue of

The exchange follows friction between Conservative Central Office between Downing Street over who is to blame for the byelection defeat. Criticisms have been made of the campaign, and there have been counter-suggestions that John Major overruled a proposal to postpone the by-election until the day of local elections on 2 May. There are also thought to be sharp dif-ferences over the desirability of a Cabinet reshuffle, as the party chairman is said to want. Mr Major, it has emerged, does not want any "ritual bloodletting".

John Prescott, Labour's deputy leader, said: "Now Brian Mawhinney has given a new phrase - dump the Prime Minister. It is not our phrase. It is what Tory MPs and Tory activists are muttering which is why it was on his mind."

Howard 'ignored common sense' in Bulger case

Coupons in the Sun newspaper rather than expert social inquiry reports led to the Home Secretary's "unlawful" decision to fix 15-year minimum sentences on the two schoolboy killers of the toddler Jamie Bulger, the High Court was told

Michael Howard's decision to make examples of the two 10 year-olds - punishing "in a blaze of publicity" as if they were adults - "flew in the face of common sense and the nenal code of every civilised society", said Edward Fitzgerald OC.

Mr Howard should have put the cut-out Sun coupons, in which readers urged whole life sentences to be imposed, in the bin, said Mr Fitzgerald. Instead, he should have called for social inquiry, psychiatric and other relevant reports. Not only did he ignore a require-ment of both domestic and international law to consider the boys' backgrounds, he also ignored all mitigation on their behalf, said Mr Fitzgerald. "No other country would have a punitive sentence imposed by a politician," he said. The boys should be entitled to a regular review of their detention, he argued.

After recent clashes between Mr Howard and top judges over crime and punishment, the OC argued that sentencing was a matter for the judiciary - not the executive. Mr Fitzgerald was launching a judicial review on behalf of Jon Venables and Robert Thompson of the Home Secretary's decision.

long that proved to be. He told Lord Justice Pill and Mr Justice Newman that what was at issue was that Mr Howard's tariff decision unlawfully centred on "retribution and deterrence".

SARAH HEI M

John Major and Jacques Santer, President of the EU Comion, are to meet in Moscow tomorrow to try to resolve the beef crisis, with no end in sight to the world-wide ban which is crippling the British industry.

Mr Santer has agreed to meet the Prime Minister on the sidelines of a G7 summit on nuclear safety as Britain prepares a legal challenge to Brussels over the ban's legality.

As the Agriculture Commissioner, Franz Fischler, told MEPs there was no question of lifting the ban without more evidence of effective government action to eradicate "mad cow" disease, officials in Brussels insisted this action was legally sound. But Brussels sources have disclosed that the Commission's legal experts, who doubted the legal power to ban exports to Third World countries, were "bullied" into accepting the wide terms of the ban by senior officials. "The attitude was: act now, think about the legal consequences later." When the ban was imposed, the Commission felt under pressure to respond to demands of member-states. But three weeks later, there is a realisation in Brussels that the Commission may have shot itself in the foot by handing Britain a cheap victory in the courts. From the Brussels vantagepoint, the British legal action looks designed to divert attention from the real problem. Yesterday Douglas Hogg, the agriculture minister, had still failed to offer a convincing eradication plan which might convince his EU partners to lift the ban.

Despite the package of anti-BSE measures announced by Mr Hogg on Tuesday, the EU Agriculture Commissioner, Franz Fischler, said in Strasbourg that Britain would have to go further to get the global trade boycott lifted. "We have heard what the British had to say yesterday. We are waiting for further measures." Mr Fischler said the next move was up to

Officials say the Commis-sion expects Mr Hogg to come to Brussels next week with specific proposals for targeting productive herds with a record of BSE, in addition to the planned cull of older dairy animals and destruction of meat from animals older than 30

The overall eradication plan would then be put to EU agriculture ministers scheduled to meet in Luxembourg on 30 April. Until then, they said, Mr Fischler's hand were tied. But there were indications last night that the Commission could agree to an early lifting of the ban for Northern Ireland and Scotland in recognition of the lower incidence of the disease there. The Commission says the legal action to lift the worldwide ban is irrelevant to the existence of the ban, as it might

Praise for fire service efficiency

Fire brigades are among the most consistently outstanding services provided by local government, according to figures published yesterday.

A report on the performances of police forces and fire brigades published by the Au-dit Commission, the public spending watchdog, says that on average fire brigades met nationally-set target times for re-sponding to calls 95 per cent of the time in 1994/95, a 1 per cent increase on the previous year.

"By this measure, the fire service is one of the most consistently high-performing services in local government, with almost all brigades achieving national standards for at least nine out of 10 calls," the report says.

Oxfordshire achieved the best figure, 99.5 per cent, with the worst figure of 81.2 per cent being recorded by Suffolk. However Cleveland, which last year returned the worst figure. this year failed to provide the relevant statistic at all and said the figures were flawed.

The report also noted with concern a 7 per cent increase in the number of false alarm calls, which incurred some £40m expenditure responding to them.

Commuters to get new trains

CHRISTIAN WOLMAR

Kent commuters travelling on some of the oldest trains on the rail network were promised new trains within three years under the terms of a franchise put on the market yesterday by Roger Salmon, the franchising director.

The successful bidder for the franchise for South Eastern Trains will be required to provide new rolling stock, according to Mr Salmon, who said: "I am inviting bids on the basis of a 15-year franchise, which requires replacement within three years of South Eastern's slamdoor rolling stock." Normally franchises are for seven years which does not allow sufficient time for bidders to buy new

The existing trains, some of which date back to 1957, are likely to reach the end of the line by 1999. The franchise is expected to be awarded by the end of the summer. Opponents of privatisation, point out that British Rail would have bought new trains for the line by now but was prevented from doing so by the privatisation process.

Network South East was to have received 100 new Networker trains between 1995 and 1997, many of which would have been for South Eastern, but the order was not proceeded with because of uncertainty over privatisation. Jonathan Bray, co-ordinator of the Save Our Railways campaign, said: "The whole plant at ABB York [now Adtranz] has now been closed down because of the failure to proceed with the order. It is unclear who will now be able to build these trains." The line runs from London's Charing Cross, Victoria and Cannon Street stations to destinations including Hastings, Ashford, Folkestone, Dover and Margate. Mr Bray said the trains would have had to be replaced anyway and that commuters on South West Trains and Network SouthCentral - which also needed new trains - were not getting any new fleets but those franchises "were not issued just before a key Commons

Yesterday the court was told the woman went to Prof Macleod's study in the church college in November, 1991, after he offered to lend her a book for one of her courses. She was sure he locked his office door and then sat on the arm of the chair she was sitting on, discussing the book he was giving to her.

She felt uncomfortable and got up to leave. "I tried to get away as quickly as I could. As I was leaving, near the door, he attempted to kiss me and I pulled away." She left immediately afterwards.

Young offenders to go to 'glasshouse'

CHRISTOPHER BELLAMY Defence Correspondent

The dreaded "glasshouse" Military Prison at Colchester will become home to up to 32 civilian young offenders from this autumn, the Government confirmed yesterday.

Ann Widdecombe, Minister of State for the Home Office, said civilian offenders would live separately from the military inmates of the Military Corrective Training Centre and would not be subject to military law. She said the establishment of a civilian wing at Colchester was a pilot scheme to complement the high-intensity youngoffenders' programme at Thorn

Nicholas Soames, the Minister of State for the Armed Forces said yesterday that he was one of the 'godfathers' of the pilot scheme at Colchester and he had been so impressed by the regime that he had recommended the idea to Home Secretary Michael Howard of putting civilian offenders there.

Ann Widdecombe said she honed the results would lead to a reduction in reoffending rates - currently 70 per cent in civilian Young Offenders Institutions. The equivalent at Major Mark Colchester is 7 per cent.

During its brief life, the Chilli Pepper restaurant boasted a Chef of the Year, a five-star rating for its atmosphere and - the icing on the cake - a Restaurant of the Year title. The only thing it did not have was any food.

Despite being awarded several top prizes, the Chilli Pepper was nothing more than a fake letterhead and an accommodation address set up to expose bogus restaurant awards.
The ruse, devised by the BBC's Food and Drink programme, is likely to result in a trading standards investigation into the awarding of titles and certificates for money after two

"We wrote to the companies saying we were a new restaurant and invited them to inspect us to see whether we were worthy of a rating," said Tim Hincks, the programme's producer. "Several weeks later, both wrote to us to say they had inspected our restaurant and wanted to give it some awards ... for a fee."

One of the companies, Quality Cuisine UK, based in Edinburgh and Dunfermline, said its inspector was so impressed he had named the Chilli Pepper his Restaurant of the Year and its chef the Chef of the Year. The programme's researchers have now handed over their findings to trading stan-dards officials. They found seven other companies prepared to give awards for money, but it remains to be established

"It's a bit of a grey area because it is unclear who is being ripped off," said Mr Hincks. "I'm quite sure a lot of restaurateurs receive unsolicited letters from these people and are genuinely pleased to have won an award. In those cases, who's being taken for a ride? The restaurateur or the customer?"

Mike Drewry, director of consumer services at Edinburgh council, said: "We have been contacted by restaurants all over the UK who have been approached by Quality Cuisine UK, and now we're expecting a flood of complaints after the Food and Drink programme.

the medical profession's guidelines as to when a "do not resuscitate (DNR) policy is appropriate, medical experts unanimously agreed that the frail five-stone patient would only suffer further injury if the violent resuscitation process were to be carried out and that in such a case it would be in his best interests to let him die.

And they agreed that, if he suffered a serious infection, doctors should consider not giving him antibiotics to prolong his life, but only after consultation with his family.

Sir Stephen Brown, President of the High Court Family Division, today reserved judgment on the case, which has no legal precedent because it involves future decisions as to a patient's treatment rather than immediate withdrawai of life support to allow someone to die in peace.

The man's parents support the doctors' view because they believe their son has an "unacceptable quality of life".

James Munby QC, for the Official Solicitor, said: "The primary consideration is the quality of life after the proposed treatment has been given. The determining factor is whether there will be pain, suffering and stress which is so extreme that the artificial prolongation of life cannot be justified."

But staff at a day-care centre attended by the man - referred to only as "R" - became concerned at the idea of a DNR policy and took the case to court through the Official Solicitor. who stepped in to represent the man's interests.

The parents were present at today's hearing when the judge was told there was no longer any real dispute over the their son's future care. But despite the agreement, it was still for the court to decide whether South Buckinghamshire NHS Trust should have permission to apply the DNR guidelines. The udge said he would give his ruling at a later date.

Adrian Whitfield QC, for the Trust, stressed that the Trust had never operated a "do not treat" policy. DNR related solely to the question of when it was appropriate not to administer cardiopulmonary resuscitation.

Mr Whitfield said R was born with dreadful disabilities and still lived "on the level of a new-born infant". The man reacted to pain and distress, and smiled when cuddled and in response to sweet food and music. But it was doubtful whether he could see and there were no signs of his being knowingly aware of his environment.

ernment of relying on "obedi-ent quangos" to back it up. In a speech to the Royal Society of Arts in London he praised the Labour Party for avoiding political dogma on education and called for an incoming Labour government to make schools its top priority. Sir Claus, who set up his commission after his calls for a Royal Commission on Education were rejected by the Government in 1990, is one tempts to put political distance between itself and Labour by planning to open more grammar schools. "Education remains as much a political football as ever. I am dismayed by such an approach, not to mention the outbursts from right-wing think thanks and the policy unit at No 10. It is all about politics, not about children. Labour policy statements are freer of political dogma," he said. The nursery voucher scheme which was launched this week had been hijacked by political advisers, he said, resulting in a programme which would help middle-class parents rather than those in need. The result was a hotchpotch which was little better than nothing.

He criticised the chief inspector of schools, Chris Woodhead, for his attacks on teachers and apparent willingness to support government policies. Mr Woodhead's assertions that class size did not matter were

He also attacked the Gov-ernment's "piecemeal" at-ent quangos time and again ent quangos time and again throw doubt on the evidence."

Recent debates on moral values were "depressing and ludi-crous," he added. Headteachers were only too well aware of the need for morality in schools.

A new Labour government should provide universal nursery education, raise standards in primary schools and boost the image of the teaching profession as a matter of urgency, he said.

The changes which above all I would like to happen in our educational system are undeniably much more attractive to an incoming Labour government than to the present. It is cheering to have a Leader of the Opposition who has declared that education would be the central passion of his government."

'Lethal mix' claım over Gulf war drugs

LOUISE JURY

Gulf war troops could have been give a potentially lethal cocktail of inoculations, according to American research revealed yesterday.

A team led by Dr Tom Kurt, in Texas, found that doses of three chemicals used to protect Gulf war soldiers from nerve gas attack and insects were harmless alone, but mixed together could cause neurological problems in animals.

Veterans last night welcomed the results as the first scientific evidence supporting their claims that a variety of symp-toms dubbed Gulf war syndrome were caused this way.

They claim 19 British Gulf war soldiers have died since returning from the conflict. Around 1,000 more hope to claim damages from the Min-istry of Defence for chronic fatigue, headaches, memory loss and aching limbs they believe to have been caused by the drugs.

But while the MoD said the US findings would be examined, a spokesman said there was nothing to replace the inoculations at present. They were necessary and would be continued. "When you are sending people into a situation where you either have to say take the pills or take the risk," he said.

Neither the British nor that such and such is safe because it has been used before. We have to look more at not American government has accepted the existence of a specific condition called Gulf war syndrome. Dr Mohamed Abou-Donia, one of the researchers, said the Army had eliminated any other possibility and veterans should be now examined for signs of chemical poisoning. "We're not saying this is Gulf war syndrome, but we're saying this deserves a look," he said. The team gave healthy chickens, whose neurological pathways are similar to those in humans, separate doses of the nerve gas pill pyridostigmine and the insecticides DEET and permethrin. Taken alone, even doses three times greater than the chickens. But any two chemicals together gave them diarrhoea. shortness of breath, stumbling and other symptoms. The three taken together paralysed or killed some of the birds. Glasgow specialist Dr Goran Jamal, who recently discovered proof of nerve damage in Gulf veterans, said it would be "fool-what the substances do in themselves but what they do in combination with others." Hilary Meredith, a solicitor representing some of the British veterans, said the results were "extremely good news" in their fight against the MoD.

"If this proves the causal link between the inoculations and the symptoms it is a major step forward," she said. Veterans said there was now no excuse for the ministry to continue "delaying tactics". Major Ian Hill, chairman of the National Gulf Veterans and Families' Association, said: "We call on the Government to speed up their evaluation and research ... which will hopefully lead to a definite answer to

he problems of the suffering

Gulf war veterans." Tony Flint, a medic in the Gulf, added: "It seems strange that the research done by the British and American governments can't find anything but individual independent re-searchers have found this."

Dr David Clark, Labour's defence spokesman, said that

Around one in ten banking jobs could be lost as a result of a change in the law which will mean cheques could be "bounced" electronically.

The 30,000 redundancies caused by a system in which there would no longer be a physical exchange of cheques between banks - would come on top of an estimated 37,000 job losses already predicted to go under the general drive for increasing productivity.

Treasury ministers want to relax the Bills of Exchange and the a senior source in Lloyds, ac-Cheques Acts which stipulate that cheques have to move between banks. If, for instance, an account holder at Lloyds accepts a cheque as payment from a Bar-clays customer, Lloyds has to tary of the union, said that pass the cheque back to Bardays so that it can verify there are funds to meet the debt.

The Government is planning to change the law so that the verification can be completed on screen. Ministers are hoping to amend the law before the summer, or by autumn at the latest. That would mean thousands of jobs would go in high-street branches, plus 40 per cent of staff dedicated to the clearing system, the Banking Insurance and Finance Union says. The estimate of job losses comes from cording to the union which wants to ensure that all staff displaced are redeployed.

Ed Sweeney, general secre-

while a Treasury consultation pa-per on the subject concerned it-self with safeguards to protect customers from fraud, it made no reference to the social consequences of the change, "It's time we ended the scandal of overworked and understaffed branches who get by only on overtime, paid and unpaid."

A spokeswoman for Lloyds-TSB said that even with a change in the law it would be "a long time" before banks agreed on implementation of the new system. She added: "We don't know what the implications for jobs are, but the union estimate has no basis in fact ... at Lloyds we have a record of redeploying employees and cutting staff through natural wastage."

PC's shooting linked to drugs turf war

JASON BENNETTO Crime Correspondent

Detectives investigating the shooting of an off-duty police officer at his home are examining possible links with a violent turf war being waged between rival drug gangs. The shooting of PC Stephen Hardy, 26, in both legs and an arm, was the latest in a spate of attacks involving firearms in Merseyside. Since Saturday six men, including PC Hardy, have been shot in the legs in five separate incidents. Police said yesterday they were investigating potential connections between the shootings and a string of attacks sparked off by the murder of David Ungi, shot dead in an ambush in his car in Toxteth in May last year. Many of the shootings are known to be connected to the city's thriving drugs trade.

PC Hardy, who has three years' service in the police, was in bed with his girlfriend on Tuesday at the home they share with their 12-month-old child in

On Tuesday four to five men burst into a house in the Bootle area and shot a man twice in the legs with a handgun.

On the same day three men entered a house in Old Swan and shot a man in the legs. Armed police patrols have been increased in response.

Jim Sharples, Chief Constable of Merseyside, said yesterday that there appeared to be no motive for the "despicable" attack on PC Hardy. He added: "There are a number of criminal elements in this city who think the only way they can settle their differences is by shooting each other. "There is casual indifference to the use of firearms now with kneecappings becoming more common . . . It used to be the baseball bat, then the knife but now we have come through a threshold and it is the gun.

'Red-listed' British birds face fast decline

Three dozen British bird species have been put on a new "red list" by leading conservation organisations because the birds are either in rapid decline or seriously endangered.

Of the 36 species on the list published yesterday, 23 have had their UK populations halved or more over the past quarter century. Ten years ago there were only eight species in this category.

Things are getting worse rather than better," said Dr Mark Avery, chairman of the Birds Conservation Group which agreed the list. The fate of these birds acts as a barometer of the health of the environment." The eight conservation organisations which drew up the list believe modern farming methods are to blame for several of the species' declines. Nine farmland birds - the turtle dove, skylark, song thrush, spotted flycatcher, tree sparrow, linnet, bullfinch, reed bunting and corn bunting, have all been added since the last published list six years ago. The move from spring- to winter-sown cereals, neglect and grubbing out of hedgerows and the use of pesticides are thought to be the major causes of the birds' difficulties. Some of those on the list are extremely rare - the bittern has only about 20 breeding pairs in the country. Several hundred red-backed shrikes bred in Britain 30 years ago, but now, in some summers, the shrike raises no young here. At most only a handful of pairs breed. The red list also contains into hundreds of thousands but are falling very rapidly. Worst hit is the tree sparrow, which has seen a population decline of 89 per cent in 25 years. Dr Avery fears that when the next red list is drawn up in five years time more species will be added. "We have an amber list of 110 species found in Britain which we say are of medium concern," he said. "But among those there are several candidates for the next red list." The lists were agreed by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the British Trust for Ornithology, the Wildlife Trusts, the National Trust and four other conservation organisations. The groups looked at data for some 300 species which breed or winter in these islands, and decided that almost half gave grounds for concern.

Red-list birds were those whose population had at least halved in 25 years, had suffered a long-term population decline in the past two centuries, or where the global population was now very low and Britain was home to a large part of it.

The conservation organisa-tions say that with the right research, policies, incentives and cash backing, the declines can be halted and species brought back from the brink; numbers of breeding corncrakes, for example, have risen for the past two summers in the Scot-

Local elections: Labour and Tories start campaign with bid to prove other is most costly to live under

War of words begins with row over tax

NICHOLAS TIMMINS Public Policy Editor

Labour and the Conservatives yesterday launched their local election campaigns with the traditional war of words over tax and spending in a contest for 3,000 councils seats that is likely to see the Tories pushed even further into third place in local government.

Brain Mawhinney, the Conservative Party chairman, revived the traditional Tory theme that "Conservative councils cost you less" using figures for the six councils where the Tories remain entirely responsible for local taxes to argue that Labour authorities charge £225 more, on average, for a Band D property and the Liberal Democrats £139 more.

Labour hit back using average council tax figures - a fair-er reflection, Labour claims, of what people actually pay - 10 argue that the Labour average is £513 against £536 for Conservative councils and £567 for the Liberal Democrats. With steep increases in the council tax pencilled in for the next two years - the equivalent of almost 2p on the standard rate of tax on Labour's calculations - the party launched under the slogan The Tories hit you where it

With both Labour and the Liberal Democrats anticipating gains, Tony Blair, the Labour leader, said his party's success on 2 May "will bring forward the day when we can finally rid the country of this tired, discredited government" replacing it with one "with the ideas and energy to get this country going Mr Blair said the issue was "ultimately about trust", with Labour already trusted to run more councils than ever before - 200 - compared with the 14 the Conservatives still control.

Britain is "already being built". As Labour pointed out that average council tax increases have come in at 6.3 per cent against the Treasury's assumption in the grant settlement of 8 per cent, John Gummer, Secretary of State for the Environment, argued that Tory groups had proposed lower increases in many areas.

"While Mr Blair was holding out the prospect of tax cuts, his councillors were busy raising taxes and undermining the Government's tax cuts in the process," he said.

Mr Blair replied that the Government's budget plans would force up local tax bills next year and the year after. "It is a con trick which we will expose in this campaign. On taxation, the Tories are giving with one hand and taking with the other"

Gillian Shephard, the Secretary of State for Education, stepped up the row over selection, attacking the pledge made by Trafford council in Manchester to examine how to make its six grammar schools non-selective if, as expected, it turns its minority Labour control into full control on 2 May. That, she claimed, would reverse the decision of parents at Altrincham Boys' Grammar, one of the best performing schools in the country, which opted out this month. Beverley Hughes, Trafford's leader, said half the children in parts of the borough received a grammar school education against only six per cent in more deprived areas. That was "something that must be examined" when the council's priority was "quality not just the 30 per cent with ingham, and North Tyneside's grammar school places.

Warning over control of Internet

Governments should "tread warily before trying to control the Internet, the worldwide computer network, despite fears about it being used for terrorism or the spread of pornography, Science and Technology minister Ian Taylor warned yesterday.

He told the Commons at Question Time that he hoped a "highway code" for users would be drawn up in the coming weeks.

His comments came as President Bill Clinton disclosed he was worried the Internet was aiding international terrorism by making it too easy for sinister forces to learn how to make bombs or produce nerve gas. Mr Taylor stressed: "Governments should tread warily in trying to control the information on the Internet. "If it's designed to survive a nuclear attack, it's likely to be resistant to government

But he added: "That does not mean to say that there is not a large onus on the network service providers to try to provide a highway code for potential purchasers of software and I'm encouraging them to do that, and I rather hope that we will see progress over the next few weeks."

Labour to end NHS staff gag

NICHOLAS TIMMINS

Doctors and nurses will be restored to the boards of health authorities and hospitals if Labour wins the next election, Harriet Harman, the party's health spokeswoman, said yesterday. A Labour government would also "act to end the gag on NHS staff", she said, believing it is in the public interest for "all health service staff to be able to speak freely about their professional concerns". But she told a British Medical Association meeting in Leeds that Labour would also set "tough new standards for patient care". That would include not just published targets for reduced waiting times, but tables setting out the numbers readmitted for treatment and the number who get infections after treat-

"This kind of information will be published nationally for the first time, and made available to patients," she said.

Her move came as Stephen Dorrell, the Secretary of State for Health, appeared to rule out moves by NHS Trusts to sell their own-brand health insurance to patients. Some 30 trusts are said to

In a letter to Alan Milburn, the Labour health spokesman, he maintained that Mr Malone's answer was a statement of "the longstanding legal position". But he added: "I do not believe that private health insurance schemes could in any circumstances be introduced without an unacceptable risk to public funds. I do not believe there is any reason for the NHS to involve itself in that activity." Mr Milburn argued that Mr Dorrell's comments amounted to a major climbdown after Mr Malone's comments.

clash over elected mayors

NICHOLAS TIMMINS

Tony Blair and Michael Heseltine clashed over proposals for an elected mayor for London at the opening of the local election campaign vesterday as the Labour leader underlined his commitment to the idea.

John Gummer, Secretary of State for the Environment, joined the attack. Labour, he said, in its recent consultation document on London had been unable to decide "whether i wants a mayor or a new GLC Greater London Council). So it has decided it will have both."

But Mr Blair, in a speech in London, insisted that the idea offered "real potential to be the spur for the renewal of local democracy in this country".

"Strong civic leadership could help restore much needed civic pride in London," he said. "Imagine the potential energy an elected mayor could give to London in the new milennium. Not a ceremonial role, but elected political leadership which has as its job speaking up for the people of London and driving the renewal of the city." The potential, he added, was equally strong for other cities in Britain". His comments came after

Ms Short on the right lines

Clare Short, the Labour from the cher who upset her party leadership by expressing an almost socialist view of taxation, yesterday returned to the touchy subject.

Spiking Tory guns as she opened a debate on the sale of Railtrack, the shadow transport secretary said she would "like to say a word on tax". But, to cheers from her colleagues, she went on: "The cost of privatising the railways amounts to an extra £106.38 for every taxpayer in the country. This is equal to an extra 1p on the basic rate of income tax."

Ms Short had been expected to come under attack from MPs hoping to exploit her weekend remarks. However most Conservative backbenchers gave the debate a

Baltic states seek defence 3 guarantees

adrian Bridge

Amid mounting fears that they night be left behind in the race to join Nato, leaders of the three Baltic states are pressing the West to come up with convincing alternative strategies for their security.
It is not a task they are facing with relish. Having regained independence from Moscow just five years ago, all three countries believe that the only way they can keep it is by becoming part of the western military alliance. As the Estonian Prime Minister, Tiit Vahi, put it: "What we really want is a security guarantee in the form of Nato membership as soon as possible. But if it is going to stop short of that then, please, tell us what you have in mind."

Mr Vahi yesterday had the chance to put his point across personally to Nato Secretary General Javier Solana during his brief stop-over in Tallinn.

The content of their private discussion was not revealed. In public, however, Mr Solana restated that none of the 11 countries currently seeking to join Nato had been excluded and that, while not being ruled in, the Baltic states had definitely not been ruled out.

Despite such reassurances in public, Nato officials admit privately that there are more difficulties surrounding the membership bids from the Baltic states than those from other former communist countries, such as Hungary and Poland. which will almost certainly be admitted to the alliance first.

The main problem concerns Russia and its violent objection to any suggestion that the Baltic states could one day join Nato. Russia is opposed to Nato expansion in principle, but is particularly sensitive about the idea of the alliance advancing up to its borders.

On top of Moscow's objections, Estonia and Latvia have the additional complication of containing very large ethnic-Russian minorities, while Es-dependence, many Western leaders baulk at the idea of actually being called upon to defend it. As Douglas Hurd, the former British foreign secretary, put it recently: "Is it really credible that the United States or, indeed, Britain would undertake to defend Estonia if this could only be done with nuclear Instead of Nato membership, Mr Hurd suggested that Baltic security concerns could best be met within a defence pact with neighbouring Scandinavian countries, headed by Sweden and Finland, neither of which are Nato members. Under such an arrangement. Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia would clearly come under some sort of Western umbrella, but would not belong to an organ-isation viewed by many in Moscow as hostile.

On a practical level, Scandinavian countries have already contributed more than others to the building up and retraining of Baltic armed forces, and are happy to go on doing so. They are horrified, however, at the suggestion that they should bear ultimate responsibility for their security.

*This idea is simply unworkable," said a Scandinavian diplomat in Tallinn. "The Nordic countries are happy to complement Nato assistance here, but they cannot replace it." Baltic leaders themselves fear that given recent moves in Russia towards recreating something of a union with former Soviet republics, exclusion from Nato will allow Moscow to think that they have fallen into "grey zone". "For us a 'grey zone' would be a very black scenario," said Mari-Ann Kelam, Estonian foreign ministry press spokesman. It could leave the impression that we were up for grabs."

To counter this impression, Baltic politicians would seek to step up their involvement in Nato's Partnership for Peace programme and would like to invite many more forces from Nato countries to participate in iomt traini ig exercises on Balbo

US patches up frayed relations with Japan

RICHARD LLOYD PARRY

In the old days, it was in Europe that American presidents made big statements about international security. They went to Asia for talk of human rights, markets, and trade imbalances. Bill Clinton's State visit to Japan, which got under way in Tokyo yesterday, is a lesson in how much priorities have changed since the end of the Cold War: an Asian summit devoted principally to security and the maintenance of what American leaders refer to as the most important bilateral relationship in the world.

In form, the meeting be-tween Mr Clinton and the Japanese Prime Minister, Ryutaro Hashimoto, has been conventional enough. But the contrasts with previous summits, dominated by fractious arguments about trade, are striking.

The joint statement exchanged by the two leaders in front of the Akasaka Palace yesterday was itself an indication of the change of emphasis. The meat of the agreement was about security, a forceful confirmation of the status quo in the face of gathering uncertainty inside and outside Japan.

The Joint Declaration on Security contains no surprises. The US will maintain 100,000 forward-deployed troops in Asia, and around 47,000 of these, the same number as before, will be based in Japan. The plan to return one-fifth of the two sides will continue to cooperate on intelligence-gathering and strategy in times of crisis, and jointly develop the F2 support fighter. Tokyo will continue to pay for the maintenance of its military guests; Washington will continue to support Japan's bid for a permanent seat on the UN Security Council. But behind all this mutual reaffirmation there is more than a little nervousness, and it comes at a crucial moment, both for Asian security as a whole and for America's particular interests in

Touted in the Joint Declara-tion as a celebration of "one of the most successful bilateral relationships in history", the summit is in many ways the culmination of a giant damage limitation exercise which began last September after the rape of a 12-year-old Japanese schoolgirl by three US servicemen on the island of Okinawa.

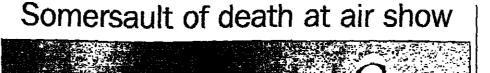

The crime galvanised longstanding resentment on the island, where three-quarters of all US bases and 29,000 US troops are concentrated. In October, 85,000 Okinawans rallied in protest at the US presence. The Prefecture Governor, Masahide Ota, refused to sign documents necessary for the compulsory leasing of land used by the bases. The dispute remains embarrassingly unresolved. The Okinawa issue was in part pre-empted by the unveiling on Monday of an American Okinawan land currently occupied by the bases. The cost, to be met by the Japanese, is estimated at 1 trillion yen. But the visit is also a reflection of wider anxieties about Asia. Mr Clinton visited the aircraft carrier Independence which, less than a month ago, was nervously watching over Chinese missile tests in the Straits of Taiwan, Earlier, he and Mr Hashimoto discussed the situation on the Korean border. where North Korean troops violated the armistice earlier in the month. If war did break out on the peninsula, the American military effort would be supplied and coordinated from Okinawa.

But a fog of ambiguity surrounds Japan's actual role in the event of an emergency. Under the post-war constitution Japan is forbidden from "the use of force as a means of settling in-ternational disputes". Its military is strictly designated as the Self Defence Force. Any suggestion that it might operate outside the confines of Japanese territory is profoundly controversial.
US officials refuse to be drawn into discussion of another country's constitutional dilemmas; the Japanese say vaguely that their response to an emergency will depend on what that emergency may be. As Mr Clinton and Mr Hashimoto shook hands yesterday, there was a strong suspicion they were crossing their fingers behind their backs, and hoping their grand words would never be tested.

Berlusconi faces election trouble in paradise

ANDREW GUMBEL

If Silvio Berlusconi fulfils his dreams, maybe one day all of Italy will look like this. Rows of pleasant suburban blocks of flats in brownish-red, ample lawns and flower beds, children in designer jeans riding tricycles along gleaming concrete pathways and family BMWs parked neatly in underground garages. Welcome to Milano 3 – a kind of yuppie mini-city built by Mr Berlusconi during his days as a construction magnate in the late 1970s and now home to 10,000 well-to-do members of the Milan commuter beit moulded in his own image. This is the Berlusconi dream made flesh, bright and pleasant like something out of the floor-polish adverts broadcast on his private television stations. Even the street signs are adorned with the symbol of Mr Berlusconi's Channel Five.

But these days there is trouble even in this secluded paradise. Mr Berlusconi's political party, Forza Italia, is lagging in the campaign for this Sunday's general election, under pressure not only from the centre-left opposition but also from its independent erstwhile partner, the Northern League (still popular around Milan), and its current bosom ally, the reformed neo-Fascist National Alliance.

Mr Beriusconi himself looks like a man bracing for the worst. "Let's hope, let's really hope," he said at a meeting in central Milan on Tuesday night a far cry from his usual effu-Forza Italia's MP for Milano

3. a bright and energetic education specialist called Valentina Aprea, finds herself battling to keep what is now considered a marginal constituency because of the unglamorous highrise council blocks and semi-abandoned farmhouses that lurk a few kilometres beyoud the town's security gates. Mrs Aprea is popular locally thanks to a winning person-

work in the constituency and in various cultural and educational commissions in Rome. But that may not be enough to get her re-elected.

The polis put me ahead, but 30 per cent of my electorate is still undecided. In these last few days I'm gunning for the moderate, Catholic vote," she said. "Italy needs a strong centrist party, and I think Silvio Berlusconi is the ideal leader, a true moderate."

Such words capture Forza Italia's big problem, which is that its voters are moderate but that its leader clearly is not, despite strenuous public relations efforts to paint him that way. In fact the party's moderate wing has been squeezed in this election campaign, partly because Mr Berlusconi has succumbed to the growing influence of the National Alliance leader, Gianfranco Fini, and partly because his most moderate senior confidant, Vittorio Dotti, was expelled recently because his girlfriend was spilling sensitive formation to the judiciary. Mrs Aprea is a case in point. Although one of the party's few bright young politicians, as a moderate she has been refused a place on Forza Italia's list for the part of the election decided by proportional representation. If she fails in her constituency she will have no chance to be "resality and two years of hard cued and sent back to Rome.

Partly because of Mr Berlusconi's problems with anti-corruption magistrates and the conflict of interest between his television stations and his political career, he has been slowly squeezed out of the position of pólitical dominance he enjoyed two years ago when he first swept to power.

His Thatcherite, free-marketeering programme has been heavily diluted to meet the needs of the National Alliance, which has wooed voters with promises of plentiful state jobs and welfare benefits. The contradictions within the centreright alliance have become an electoral liability, with Mr Berlusconi on the one hand promising to reduce the size of the state but on the other saying no jobs will actually be cut.

in the last week, Forza Italia's campaign has become more desperate as the party demonises the opposition as Communists nostalgic for the corrupt old order - a line that worked two years ago when the left was more monolithic but cuts little ice now that it has turned into a broad coalition.

Privately, there is resentment too at the strength of the National Alliance and at Mr Fini's responsibility for provoking an election at a time of weakness for Mr Berlusconi.

The party leader for the Lombardy region, Onofrio Amoluso Battista, said the best Forza Italia could hope for was an inconclusive election result followed by a cross-party pact with the left-wing PDS on constitutional and electoral reform.

If that is true, then Mr Berlusconi is in real trouble. And if he is pushed aside by Mr Fini after the election, that will effectively radicalise the centre-right even further. "Without Berlusconi, Forza Italia is finished," said a member of the party's parliamentary staff in Rome. The end of Forza Italia would leave a recently converted neo-Fascist party as the only credible force on the Italian right - a prospect even Mr Berlusconi's worst enemies would not relish.

That, apparently, was the reason the Dominican Republic government locked up Lieutenant-Colonel Michel François, former head of Haiti's militaryled police and the driving force behind the 1991 coup against Mr Aristide, and Franck Romain, former mayor of the Haitian capital, Port-au-Prince. When the US ordered the 1991 coup leaders out of the country in September 1994, including Colonel Francois and General Raoul Cedras, nothing was said about their return.

And what of the old Tontons Macoutes or their later manifestation, the Fraph (Front for the Advancement and Progress of Haiti) who terrorised Haitians before the US intervention?

"These guys are still out there and they may have weapons." Stan Schrager, spokesman for the US embassy in Port-au-Prince, told the Independent yesterday. "What happens after June 30, when the UN troops leave? I don't know."

Ambush blow to Yeltsin's hopes

PHIL REEVES

Just as his political fortunes seemed to be rallying, the Chechen war has reared up in the face of Boris Yeltsin with the death of 26 Russian troops in a rebel attack timed to undermine one of the most important fixtures of his election campaign

As the embattled president went wooing voters in the southern Russian city of Budennovsk yesterday - scene of a mass hostage-taking by Chechen separatists last year - news reached Moscow that rebels had laid waste a Russian convoy 30 miles south of Grozny.

According to a Russian military spokesman, 26 servicemen were killed and 51 were wounded in the attack which no doubt to the further discomfort of the Kremlin - oc-

the G7 countries, including John Major, gather in Moscow for a heavily-hyped nuclear summit this weekend.

The episode was yet another dent in Russian efforts to convince the international community and domestic voters that the Chechen war is coming to a close, following Mr Yeltsin' announcement on 31 March of an end to major military operations and the his peace plan.

Despite Russian denials, it has become clear that fighting on both sides has continued, in cluding aerial bombing raids by the Russian military on Chechen villages - most recently, Goiskoye.

Details of yesterday's assault were incomplete last night but the Interfax news agency said the Chechens attacked a convoy of 27 lorries, blasting them from close range with rocket-

Last month, on the eve of an all-important Russian Security Council meeting on a settlement for Chechnya, they stormed into Grozny and held part of the city for three days.

As he campaigned through the city yesterday. Mr Yeltsin made no mention of the ambush. He did, however, have harsh words for the Chechens, accusing the rebel leader Dzhokhar Dudayev of disrupting all previous peace efforts.

Haiti, US plan for Lebanon kills ceasefire hopes | Start | St

the Hizbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon and leave Israel's occupation army in place for months to come.

Lebanese ministers tried to put a brave face on the US plan - in London, Rafiq Hariri, the Lebanese prime minister, sug-gested it contained "positive" elements - but Farez Bouiez, the foreign minister, said in Cairo that it contradicted "all UN resolutions regarding the Middle East peace process".

The Lebanese and Syrians were particularly dismayed to find that it made no reference to the 1978 UN Security Council resolution 425 which called for the withdrawal of all Israeli troops from southern Lebanon

Sharaa and Ali Akhar Velayati would arrive in Beirut to help secure a new peace, neither came to Lebanon. Mr al-Sharaa contented himself with offering Syria's support for an end to the violence while an ex-pected Iranian delegation never showed up.

It would be pleasant to conclude that the US proposals persuaded Israel to cancel air attacks on Beirut for the first time in seven days but fierce storms and heavy cloud cover may have prevented Israeli raids. The Israeli bombardment of southern Lebanon continued as 10 more Katyusha rockets were fired by Hizboliah, six of them landing in Galilee and wounding an Israeli civilian, the other four in Israel's occuat the news that Hizbollah has acknowledged the death of a single guerrilla, killed in the southern village of Jebel el-Butm, near Tyre.

There was confusion, however, over the scope and content of some of the American proposals. In verbal messages to Lebanese and Syrian ministers. the US said that both Israel and Hizboliah should agree to end all attacks on civilians and that Hizbollah must lay down its arms - or be disarmed - in southern Lebanon; after nine months of peace, Israel would begin discussions on a military withdrawal. In reality, it was never possible that the Lebanese or the Syrians - who dominate the Lebanese government and much of Lebanon where they

one of the most powerful proposals handed to the Lebweapons at his disposal in the ancse foreign ministry by the US negotiations with Israel over the ambassador to Lebanon on occupied Golan Heights. And Tuesday night, there appears to after seeing how Yasser Arafat's be no reference to the disarmtrust in Israeli withdrawal ing of Hizbollah. The Ameritimetables was betrayed - after can letter calls for a return to the PLO-Israeli peace was the 1993 Israeli-Hizbollah signed the late Israeli prime agreement, which called for minister Yitzhak Rabin anboth sides to refrain from tar-

Hizbollah would go on fighting Israeli soldiers inside southern Lebanon - and, of course, viceversa – providing the Israelis did not shell Lebanese villages and Hizbollah did not fire Katyushas into Galilee.

Even this watered-down version of the wider proposals seemed to the Lebanese to contain several traps. The absence of any mention of UN resolution 425 in the letter as well as the verbal proposals troubled Beirut and Damascus while the American ambassador was asked to clarify a reference in the letter to the need for a new "mechanism" to implement the ceasefire agreement.

The Lebanese were also worried that the terms of the ceasefire would allow Israel to shell lages in which Lebanese civilian deaths prompted the Hizbollah Katyusha retaliation that provoked Israel's counter-retaliation eight days ago. Hizbollah has still to study the US proposals, although Mohamed Fneich, one of Hizbollah's eight members of the Lebanese parliament, last night avoided some of the more familiar rhetoric of his movement. The Americans had allied themselves with Israel against the Hizbollah at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit, he said, but nothing would prevent the guerrillas from carrying out "their sacred right to liberate their land". He listed at least 10 mcidents in which Lebanese civilians had died, but carefully

"If they are not going to withdraw from southern Lebanon, then we must meanwhile go back to the July (1993) agree-ments. If they stop shooting at civilians, the Katyushas will stop. That is the equation.

Amid all the talk of proposals – and the continued shellfire southern Lebanon where the Israelis have killed two more Lebanese army soldiers the French initiative for peace appears to have temporarily dissolved. The Israelis, who know that the US will dutifully reflect Israel's demands, were not likely to smile upon a European nation which, almost alone, has dared to condemn israel for killing so many civilians

Operation news control' is ushered in

It was crude stuff. Through the heavily fortified border post at Metulia marched 30 schoolboys, living in the Israeli occupation zone in south Lebanon, who waved the Israeli flag with its blue Star of David and the Lebanese flag with its green

They will be taken from here by buses to the centre of the country for a couple of days of what may be called rest and recreation," said Colonel Shaul Camisa, the head of civil assistance in Israel's liaison unit for Lebanon. He said the boys represented "all the various ethnic groups and religious denominations in Lebanon".

The children themselves cheerfully admitted that they. came from a more select group, not entirely typical of the 180,000 people in the occupation zone. They said they were the children of security officials or of members of the South Lebanon Army, the Israeli-controlled militia. They have twice before been on such trips to Israel.

Israel is eager to show that it is doing something for the 400,000 Lebanese displaced by its bombardment. In addition to the jaunt for the children. Colonel Camisa said people ordered by Israel to leave their villages nine miles away on the other side of the Israeli zone were free to seek refuge with-

In the wake of the 1982/4 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, which left 12,000 Lebanese dead, and Operation Accountability in 1993 which killed some 129 Lebanese, Israel is eager to show that it is concerned about civilian casualties. Spokesmen stress that no village is attacked until it is certain its inhabitants have fled.

David Kreislman, an official of the government press office, said Israel has limited interest in letting the foreign media go to Israeli military positions. He explained frankly that Israel wanted to avoid television news stories in which film of an Israeli heavy artillery piece firing a shell was "juxtaposed" with a shot from Lebanon of an amoulance taking people to hospital.

In many respects the Israeli handling of the media during Operation Grapes of Wrath is similar to that of the US in the Gulf war. In both cases public relations were given high priority. Briefings by senior generals were frequent. Video films, taken by attacking aircraft, of guided missiles and bombs striking their targets were shown immediately on television.

Hizbollah has rejected a US initiative linking a ceasefire to long term talks about a full Israeli withdrawal from south Lebanon.

France in new bid for peace

Paris (Reuter) - French Foreign Minister, Hervé de Charette, will return to Israel today for a meeting with Prime Minister Shimon Peres, his ministry said. Mr de Charette, who is on a Middle East shuttle aimed at winning a ceasefire in southern Lebanon, has prepared a new plan to end the fighting. A statement by Francesaid Mr

Peres would receive Mr de Charette, who is in Cairo after two visits to Israel and one to Syria and Lebanon, this morning. France proposed yesterday that the United States and itself guarantee a ceasefire in south Lebanon, according to a plan made available by diplomatic sources after Mr de Charette arrived in Egypt on the latest leg of a peace shuttle.

The French plan called for commitments by Israel, Lebanon and Hizbollah guerrillas not to attack civilian populations in each other's country.

"These commitments are noted by the guarantor third countries (the US, France and possibly other countries, particularly European)," the document said. It also aims to obtain the agreement of "other interested countries in the region, notably Syria".

It differed substantially from the US proposals in that it did not call for an end to Hizbollah attacks on Israeli forces occupying south Lebanon, nor require a direct Syrian guarantee.

news analysis Missing: £7bn of our taxes

The economy is expanding, but the Treasury's share of the national tax cake is shrinking. Why? Diane Coyle investigates

The case of the Government's missing tax billions is an unsolved mystery. Some of the finest minds at the Treasury and Customs and Excise are working on the case. The sums are so large it is difficult to imagine how they might have gone missing without anyone knowing their whereabouts. Yet the plain fact is that the Government is short of about £7bn worth of tax revenues this year.

Officials at Customs and Excise have been running an investigation into lower than expected revenues from Value Added Tax for more than a year. According to one of them: "We're still stumped. There's something funny going on and we have no idea what it is.

Several culprits have been canvassed. The most recent suspect was large-scale tax avoidance organised for multi-national companies by an army of advisers. Yet the solution to the mystery is almost certain to lie closer to hand. The profound changes that have reshaped the British economy in the past decade – deregulation, growing self-employment, the increasing number of people in low-paid jobs – may have made tax collection more difficult and tax returns more volatile.

The cost of creating a more open, flexible, entrepreneurial economy is that it makes tax receipts far less predictable. The shortfall in tax revenues may make it more difficult for the Government to afford pre-election tax cuts. The sums involved appal ministers.

In the 1994 Budget, just 17 months ago. ing tax corresponds to nearl total government income in 1995/96 was forecast at £278.9bn. The Treasury cut the figure by £2.5bn in a new forecast published in June. In last November's Budget the expected total was down to £271.9bn. Figures due out today are likely to show the actual total to be another £1bn-£2bn lower.

In other words, despite the economy growing at a rate healthy enough to reduce unemployment to a five-year low, about £7bn-worth of tax revenues, that is about twice the value of the income tax cuts that come into effect this month, has

last summer the Treasury gave its expla-nation: Britain's growing inequality of income meant the Government was collecting less tax. The mandarinese explanation was: "higher employment and lower earnings within a given level of wages and salaries" means a lower tax take. Put more simply, more people in low-paid jobs pay less tax than the same number of people in higher-paid jobs.

Another £1.7bn of the revenue shortfall is due to lower than expected receipts from corporation tax. This shortfall is a bit of a surprise. Companies should be paying tax now on the bumper profits they earned in 1994. Companies are allowed to offset some losses against their corporation tax liability, and large companies sensibly try to organise their losses by dif-ferent subsidiaries to the best tax advantage. Some of the missing money could be the result of - thoroughly legal corporate "tax mitigation". Yet overall corporation tax receipts are up sharply, from £15bn in 1993/94 to about £25bn in 1995/96.

The core of the puzzle is Value Added Tax, which is more than £4bn lower than the Government expected as recently as mid-1994. At the current rate of VAT that missing tax corresponds to nearly from which VAT should have been collected. Put another way, about £1,200 for every household in the UK is being spent VAT free. It is as if every household has awarded itself a tax cut by not paying VAT on some purchases. This is a mystery of enormously worrying proportions.
Where is this money going?

Large companies can be safely presumed to save more than the £100m a year which the big accountancy firms receive in fees for this type of tax avoidance work. Even so, big companies are unlikely to account for as much as a quarter of the VAT

There are two other possible explanations. To take the most straightforward answer first, patterns of spending have probably changed in ways that are unfavourable to VAT receipts. The best example is spending on the National Lottery. The lottery is estimated by City economists to have diverted spending away from items mainly lottery started 16 months ago.

These calculations still leave the biggest part of the missing tax revenues unaccounted for. The remaining £2bn-plus corresponds to average household spending of more than £600 a year. This shortfall is a feature of the "enterprise" econliable for VAT by *Ot*her does not add up to very much. The amounts of spending are too small to make a figure of 12 per cent plausible."

However, others think the recent growth of the underground, cash-in-hand economy could hold the solution to the puzzle of the missing billions. Simon Briscoe, an economist at the City of London investment bank Nikko, says: "There has been a broad shift in the structure of the economy. This is not necessarily subversive but it does mean there is less flowing towards the Evidence for the growth of the informal or underground economy is necessarily mainly anecdotal. Yet the forces driving its growth are clear. The Government itself has deregulated to take more smaller businesses out of the VAT net. Selfemployment is growing and with it cash payments for services. Consumers in the 1990s are determined not to pay more than necessary for anything.

The rapid growth of cash in circulation lends weight to this explanation. Cash in circulation has been growing at more than six per cent a year for two years, partly because of low interest rates and easier access to cash, but partly also due to an increased desire to use it.

The negative side of the enterprise economy as far as the Government is concerned is symbolised by the huge popularity of car boot sales. A recent study by the researchers Nicky Gregson at the University of Sheffield and Louise Crewe at the University of Nottingham estimated that a million people a week visit a car boot sale, spending nearly £8 each on average. The most popular purchases are children's clothes, which are not liable to VAT. But that leaves up to £500m in spending each week that has been switched from VAT-paying shops to non VAT-paying car boots. Dr Gregson and Dr Crewe found that few of those who visited car boot sales were unemployed - they are not the preserve of the underclass. They are frequented by ordinary shoppers looking for bargains supplied by small-scale entrepreneurs.

The authors celebrate this "world beyond the high street and mega-mall", for its energy and conviviality. But if this is the new shape of the British economy, the Treasury will have to rethink its tax

Corporate tax

There is almost no hard data, with big companies using corporation tax. But it has become a burgeoning business for consultants and accountants.

Increasingly, companies see tax as just another cost to be. cut, with complex schemes to reduce tax liabilities.

The shortfall of almost £2bn in corporate tax suggests that companies have been more successful at reducing their tax liabilities, to offset tax liabilities.

The 14.4 per cent jump in company profits in 1994 should be showing up in corporate tax returns. But as yet it isn't.

However, straightforward avoidance of corporation tax is not the main cause of the tax shortfall.

jobs has also reduce the tax take. One indicator of that is that the percentage of workers with an income below half the average income has risen from about 10 per cent in the mid-Eighties to about 19 per cent in 1993. The growth of lowincome jobs means that a larger proportion of the account for three-quarters of VAT revenues. Their tax avoidance has become more professional since the rate went up from 15 per cent to 17.5 per cent in 1991. The Big Six accountancy firms' earnings from VAT advice have risen from almost nothing to £100m a year in the Nineties.

The VAT threshold was raised to £47,000 from this year, taking many small companies out of the tax net. Spending on the National

New departures for the Fabians

I hear that the Labour Party's original think tank, the Fabian Society, is to have a new leader. Simon Crine has decided to step down, I gather, after five years as general secretary.

Though he is too much of a loyalist to say so himself, friends of his tell me that he had become a little weary of the increasingly dirigiste approach of the Labour leadership.

It will be interesting to see if the Fabians, of which Mr Blair is a member, choose as his successor a confirmed Blairite or someone likely to relish intellectual challenges to policy. Mr Crine's deputy, Stephen Pollard, an advocate of selective education, has already left his post to join the Social Market Foundation.

Pulling the plug on competition

The lights of most of southern England may soon depend on decisions taken in the far south of North America. The Southern Company from over there already owns South Western Electricity over here, and now they have admitted they are interested in a merger with Britain's largest power generator, National Power. At the same time, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission (MMC) is set to clear National Power's bid for another electricity distributor. Southern Electric.

The stage is set for a substantial concentration of the electricity supply industry - leaving much of it in the hands of foreigners. Why worry? Not because the owners might be foreign but because of the threat it poses to competition.

The fact that Southern Company is American shouldn't make any difference to its bid. US shareholders will be no more ruthless and profit-hungry than their UK counterparts. The management of South-ern should be judged on its merits, not on its country of origin.

The real objection to Southern Company's possible merger with National Power is the threat to competition that it poses. When the electricity supply industry was privatised, power generators and electricity distributors were deliberately kept separate, so that generating companies would have to sell their electricity to regional electricity companies. The wave of proposed mergers and takeovers is threatening to pull the generators and the distributors together again.

National Power already has more than a quarter of Britain's generating capacity. Joining up with South Western Electricity and Southern Electric would give it a regional distribution monopoly for the power it generates, covering several million customers. The rest of the industry is consolidating fast. Scottish Power, the generator north of the border, aiready owns Manweb, the Chester-based REC, while Hanson's Eastern Electricity is moving into generation, and the MMC is about to give the go-ahead for PowerGen to bid for Midland Electric.

Optimists argue that this consolidation will not pose a problem. The markets to provide electricity for domestic and small business customers are supposed to start opening up after 1998, weakening the local monopolies of the newly consolidated generating and supply companies. A UK electricity industry populated by five or six vertically integrated companies competing across a national market for customers might not be a bad thing.

Perhaps. But the MMC, in a leaked copy of its report on two of the pending mergers, concedes that even after 1998, competition to supply households is unlikely to be "vigorous". So families will still rely on the electricity regulator rather than competition to keep their prices down. But when suppliers and generators are all tied up together, it will be even easier for companies to pull the wool over the regulator's eyes.

Allowing the industry to consolidate so quickly now may choke the development of competition. National Power and PowerGen own almost 90 per cent of Britain's generating plant. Giving these dominant companies captive customers will make them stronger than ever, making it harder for new companies to enter the generating market.

Sadly, creating strong, dominant companies does not appear to trouble the Government, or even the MMC, the competition watchdog that has chosen to take out its own teeth. In the leaked report, the MMC justifies its relaxed attitude to vertical integration on the grounds that it will promote national champions. Shielding companies from the rigours of domestic competition is bad for UK consumers, and won't make them tough enough to flourish in foreign markets. If the Government allows these bids through it will be turning its back on competition and once again turning its back on consumers.

Carling was right: what a bunch ...

Will Carling's infamous assessment of the managerial competence of the men in blazers who run English rugby is coming horribly true. The amateurs at the Rugby Football Union, which runs the game in England, are making a complete hash of turning the game professional. In the process the RFU has almost ceded its right to run the game. That is a pity because the alternatives offered by the big, cash-hungry clubs are narrow-minded and self-serving.

The truth is that the sport as it is played here is often a second-rate spectacle. The game's administrators should have taken the opportunity of professionalism to turn it into a more exciting, spectatorfriendly, fast-moving sport. Instead the discussion appears to be polarised between the greed of the top clubs and RFU's reluctance to leave the past.

Let's go back to the beginning. Rugby Union as it is played in England is often boring, mired in the winter mud. Some of the most exciting players, in the centre and on the wings, hardly see the ball during the average game. An average game is frequently stopped by infringements that many spectators do not understand. In England forward power has become the dull but effective formula for winning.

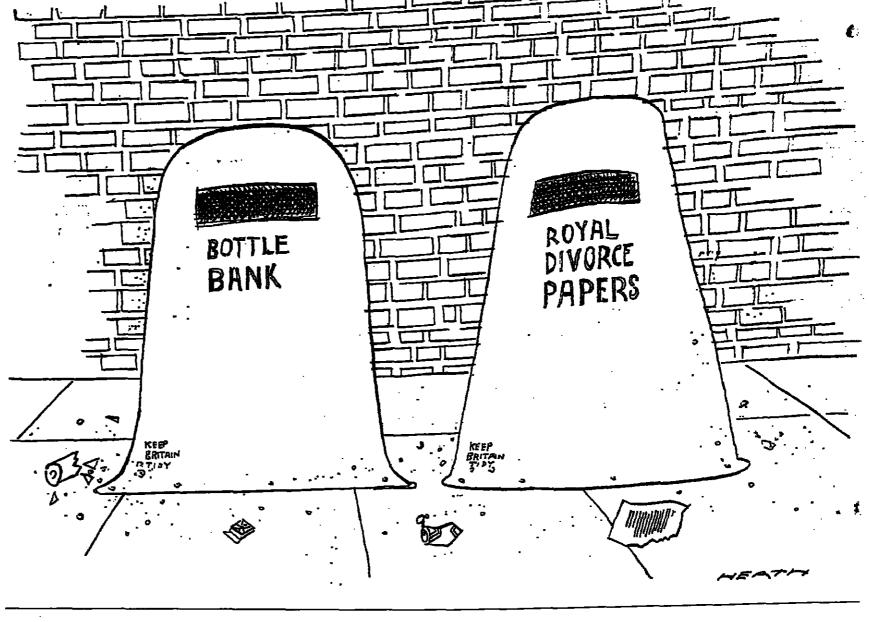

for more than a century) the rules are simple, the skills impressive and the spectacle invariably exciting and entertaining.

This audit of the sorry state of Rugby Union as a spectator sport should have formed the starting point for any serious discussion of how to turn it professional. When it was obvious last summer that the game was going professional, the RFU should have consulted the clubs and come up with proposals to protect the junior clubs, which cannot afford to go professional, while creating a top-flight pan-European competition to provide rugby of almost international standards. Instead, it has reacted painfully slowly to initiatives from the most powerful clubs, which are threatening to break away to create their own little-Englander super league. These clubs' narrow interests are unlikely to take the sport as a whole or even themselves very far without a wider, larger vision.

The mess English rugby has got itself into, squabbling about money and power while missing the bigger picture, is a far cry from the position in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, where the Super-12 series between the best regional teams in the southern hemisphere has

At issue is that the Lebanese government is either unable or unwilling to control Hizbollah. problem. Boredom. I am on the prison's "standard regime", and spend an average of 20 hours a day locked alone in my cell with nothing to do but read or listen to the radio. Some inmates who do not have prison jobs or training spend even longer in their cells. For some, drugs are seen as a way to relieve that boredom. The introduction of drug testing in prisons has actually made sible. When Lebanese towns and the problem worse. Inmates who once smoked cannabis are now turning to heroin and other hard drugs. These remain detectable in the body for a much shorter time, thus giving a greater chance of avoiding a positive drug test. An ill-conceived policy to reduce the drug problem is creating a huge number of heroin addicts that must one day be released

> I am not condoning the use of drugs, but I believe that if prisons continue to cut back on education, training, work and time out of cells, then inmates will be pushed further into the grip of drugs. Now is the time to deal with it, not next year or the year after, when society has to deal with thousands of heroinaddicted ex-inmates. The current drug testing policy must be postponed until an effective support and rehabilitation mechanism is introduced.

The BBC wouldn't jam itself. Would it? anvone. Well, talk like this always makes me feel uneasy because one likes to think that the BBC has standards, even if nobody else does these days. I mean, the BBC wouldn't pull the plug on a programme, would it? The BBC wouldn't refuse to put out news or reports which it thought risky, would it? Would it? I was thinking about all this when I was listening to the Monday repeat of Radio 4's News Quiz, that sterling programme which ranges between silly nonsense and hard-hitting comedy. Interestingly, there wasn't a single reference to the Orbit matter, but I suppose that's the sort of question they reserve for Any Questions?, which is Radio 4's version of News Quiz for people who can only think at half speed. I had turned on as much as anything to listen to Jeremy Hardy, who manages to say the most outrageous things in a harmless tone of voice which conceals the fact that (and they talk about what a great mother she is) and then people have a go at her for having fat legs! Well, if you work out with rugby players, you get fat legs, I suppose ...

he's getting away with murder. This week, for instance, when asked to comment on reports that Princess Diana's legs were a bit fat because she had too much cellulite, he replied: "Of all the things you could accuse her of, it's such a minor one. I mean, she's a social-climbing, freeloading parasite who looks like a lunatic in interviews and is sending her children to boarding school so that they can turn into the same sort of emotional cripple as their father

Rip-roaring stuff. If they had answers like that on Any Questions? instead of the party propaganda we have to put up with, I'd listen to it. But it did occur to me that if anyone senior at the BBC was listening to the programme, he might have some doubts about the propriety of this material. The BBC is not always renowned for its courage these days, and now that only 10 per cent of the workforce is actually making programmes while the other 90 per cent are thinking of ways to get the char-ter renewed, it would not be beyond credibility to interfere with stuff like

A moment later, Jeremy Hardy was being even more contentious. The topic had come up of the huge amount of theft and missing property reported from the Home Office, and Hardy chipped in with a barbed comment on Michael Howard. (Why do people keep on having a go at poor old Michael Howard? The poor chap is only doing his best. It's not Michael Howard's fault if his best is so pathetically bad.)

"Something else went from the Home Office," said Hardy, "because Michael Howard used to have the priceless recollection that his father was an asylum-seeker and he appears to have lost this memory altogether

Hmmm ... if I was a BBC bigwig, I thought, I would think seriously about taking this delightful stuff off air.

AND AT THAT VERY MOMENT THEY BEGAN TO JAM THE PROGRAMME. Just as Barry Took was giving the answer to a question, another voice

cut in over the top of him, drowning him and saying: "The gathering pace of diplomatic actions has done nothing to restrain Israel's offensive," then going on to tell us in detail about Israel's attempt to keep the Lebanese quiet by killing them all. It was the voice of one of the BBC's reporters from the Middle East, on a telephone line, and it was loud enough to make it impossible to hear what Jeremy Hardy or any-one was saying, and it went on for some time and to my mind it was a case of the BBC jamming itself, and I have all this on tape if anyone's interested.

I didn't complain to the BBC because they would be bound to come up with some feeble excuse, like they were testing the Middle East tape for the 1pm news and left the broadcasting channel open by mistake. But would the BBC broadcast something by chance? I think not. I think they were trying to jam their own programmes. And they have the nerve to criticise Orbit in Rome for being touchy.

Adapting the haiku to English

Sir: I was very pleased to see that as it becomes more widely pracyour poetry editor chose four haiku for the Daily Poem today (16 April). Although this literary form is one of the oldest in the world and has been practised in the West since the beginning of this century, there are still those who believe it can play no part other than in the Japanese poetry tradition.

James Kirkup is a skilled writer of haiku and has played a key part in bringing this genre to a wider audience in the West, but while I have great respect for him on both these counts I take issue with his statement that every haiku should have syllables.

As a member of the British Haiku Society I am as concerned as anyone that the essence of haiku should not become diluted tised. But concentration on the 5-7-5 syllable count of haiku is misleading and obscures other important features of this form a certain flexibility where appropriate can serve the spirit of haiku more faithfully than a rigid adherence to the "rules" at all

The syllable count in haiku is often misunderstood. Japanese poets do not count syllables they count onji. This word means "sound symbol" and is much shorter than the English syllable and much more uniform in length. Approximately 12 English syllables best duplicates the length of Japanese haiku in the traditional form of 17 onji.

Normal behaviour for a Duchess?

Sir: After watching a BBC news item on the divorce of the Duke and Duchess of York, and the lengthy description of the behavioural unsuitability of the Duchess, my 11-year-old daughter remarked: "I don't know why they are having a go at her, she's just normal. It's them that are abnormal." An interesting perspective on changing attitudes to the monarchy, perhaps?

say anything that isn't in the script about tax or drugs, or when Cabinet ministers say anything interesting about Europe, political Britain goes into a violent collective spasm.

But Real Britain, that country which isn't composed of MPs, spin doctors, political pundits, radio news editors, doesn't. It is becoming increasingly turned off politics, partly because of the predictable and often thoughtless nature of political argument. So a whole class of people whose lives are dedicated to communication are failing. They are not being listened to. Indeed, the more they squash themselves into radio cars, or lounge across daytime television sofas, the less they seem to be part of a real national conversation. Something yery odd is happening to politicians in Britain: they are not being listened to because of how loudly they are speaking.

The conventional image of political communication, both in Conservative Central Office and on the Labour side, is a verbal version of the alleged "trickle-down effect".

But instead of a little wealth cas-Labour side, is a verbal version of

from the metropolitan eleverdicks to the urban peasants below them. Thus if Labour politicians say again and again, "we are different, we have changed, we don't want to tax you too much", then - however much a few listeners may be bored by the repetition – eventually voters will start tod-dling around, mumbling, "Labour's different, it's changed, it doesn't want to tax us too much."

There is clearly some truth here, at least historically. The simple, vivid message of the 1978-79 Winter of Discontent kept on working for the Conservatives long after Labour had conceded most of the Thatcher tradeunion reforms. Repeated Labour claims that the Conservatives were intent on privatisation of the NHS hit home by repetition. To adapt a notorious phrase about American journalism, perhaps no party ever got elected by over-estimating the intelligence of the British voter.

Intellectual justification for this derives partly from the idea that in the garish, blaring chaos of modern you" - "It's good to talk" - "Dogs bark, cats minow, Labour puts up taxes". But the political argument used against Short and other speakers-out-of-script is, of course, the importance of collective Cabinet (and Shadow Cabinet) responsibility. Everyone signs up to the same things; everyone pretends to believe the same things; everyone says the same things. Politics is a team game.

What too many politicians have failed to see is that both justifications are slightly out of date. First, we are much more discriminating and cyni-cal consumers of information than we used to be. Advertisers are increasingly using irony, absurdity, pastiche and flights of surreal wildness in order to break through the noise barrier. Think of the car ads that make much of the product having four wheels and being painted all over with paint, except for the windows.

In this world, cynicism about political messages and politicians' media evasion is very high; however outraged ministers may be by their occasional rough treatment on, for instance, Radio 4's Today programme, polls of listeners tend to side heavily with the frustrated, in-theirfaces interviewers. Whenever some-

This suggests that for unknown numbers of voters, mantra politics must be repulsive, and doing those politicians who practice it no good at all. Eventually, there must come a moment when the "good" done to a party by the endless repetition of

be able to measure this subtle balance of interests or quite spot the moment of turn. (Maybe, at 9.23pm on 13 September 1996, on BBC News, Michael Heseltine says "oldstyle socialists" just once too often.) But it matters for how we think about collective cabinet responsibility, too. This is a constitutional doctrine intended to convey the mystical unity of "the administration" as something that is much more than a collection of individual politicians. But these days, collective responsibility is more about discipline and handling the media.

All senior politicians have become terrified of that journalistic cliché, the "split" story. They know that badly divided parties are seen as ineffective and that well-resourced rival parties will quickly spot any deviation in line between one frontbencher and another. Tony Blair was irritated by Clare Short saying something personal and sensible enough about taxation because he could visualise how the Conservatives and the Daily Mail would use it.

It is hard not to sympathise. The trouble is, we all know that politisprawling coalitions of opinion and interest. In the age of post-ideological politics, their internal disagree-ments, whether on moral issues, or Europe, or education, are bound to feature more. Often, they will become the stuff of national politics.

Pity the poor spin doctor: the ubiquity of media outlets means that the task of hiding every different shade of opinion is anyway a hopeless one. Trying to impose order on a lawnful of preening parliamentarians would drive the most determined parts white med within determined party whip mad within hours. And even if every instinct of every Europhobic Conservative or libertarian Labourite was stifled - if, in the fantasy of some political policeman, the only Labour voice was Blair's and the only Tory one was Major's - who really thinks that British politics would benefit?

There is, in Short, a battle between the requirement of a mature democracy to hear bonest views and genuine debate, and the passing needs of the party-political competition, carried out in an atmosphere of hostile scrutiny, foam-flecked tabloids and iournalistic narrow-mindedness.

itics, neither requirement will ever fully triumph. When parties abandon their instinct for discipline and for repetitious, single-minded political messages, then the party system itself will have crumbled. Yet if politicians fail to realise that there s a hunger in the country for a more serious and unpredictable political conversation, then they will continue to see their old leadership role slip into history. They just will not be

So how should the modern party leader behave when, through the thunder and crunch of masticated comflakes, he hears the Chancellor of the Exchequer being uncomfortably blunt, or when a radiopager's bleep carries the news that bloody Clare Short has been honest again?

The most important thing is to remember that absolute control over anything is an illusion; and that politics without diverse personalities and views would be a grim and soul-less affair. Characters whose thoughts and personalities are unwelcome to the writers of party scripts are the essential cast-list of a living democracy. The problem for our democracy isn't the outspokenness of politicians. (Would that it was!) The problem is the people who think there's a problem.

A war the Israelis can all support

Patrick Cockburn explains why Shimon Peres unleashed the Grapes of Wrath campaign on Lebanon

It is Israel's most popular war since 1967. When Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982, thousands of people signed a petition against the attack within 24 hours of it starting. This time there is very little dissent. The vast majority of Israelis believe that Operation Grapes of Wrath, now at the end of its first week, is the correct way to coalition or is frightened of a Likud deal with Hizbollah, the Lebanese guerrilla movement

The main difference between the war in 1982 and today is that the present operation is seen by Israelis as defensive. Hizbollah was firing Katyusha rockets across the border. Night after night Israeli television showed pictures of the small craters made by the rockets and Israeli families in northern Galilee living in deep

If anything the Israelis believe that Shimon Peres, the prime minister, waited too long. A few days before the bombardment of southern Lebanon started he was advised by his security men not to visit Kiryat Shmona, the town which is the favourite target of Hizbollah. By contrast, Bibi Netanyahu, the leader of the rightwing Likud party and his rival for the prime minister's office in the election on 29 May, was cheered as he walked through its streets.

It is also a war on the cheap. There has been no ground offensive by Israeli forces. Peres promised that there will be none, saying that in 1985 he was the man who got Israel out of Lebanon. This may turn out to be the weak point of the entire operation, but at the moment Israeli parents are not worried that their children are going to be sent to fight in Lebanon. There has not been a single Israeli military casualty in the last week, compared with the 650 soldiers who died in 1982-4.

Peres is also in a strong position because he is facing a general election in six weeks' time. If there was any dissent about Grapes of Wrath, it would come from the left, but this element is either contained in his governing election victory. The Israeli left is, in any case, never very radical. One political commentator asks: "With a left like this, who needs a right?"

But after suicide bombs killed 63 people in February and March, Peres appeared to be sliding towards defeat. Even members of the Labour party who are not overjoyed by what is happening in Lebanon can see its political advantages. Likud has lost its best card, which was to attack Peres as soft on security.

There is a further connection between the bombardment of the south of Lebanon and the suicide bombing campaign. "Israelis were more profoundly shocked by the four suicide bombs than they ever were before," says one prominent peace activist. Hizbollah is a very different organisation from Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Its support is from the Lebanese Shiah community, while the Palestinian organisations that exploded the suicide bombs are Sunni Muslim. But for Israelis, they are all Islamic fundamentalists using the same lethal tac-tics. Attacking Lebanon helps to exorcise the hatred and fear that followed the suicide bombing attacks.

In some ways it has all been too easy. Just as in the Gulf war, there are videos of "smart" weapons demolishing targeted buildings (tagged as Hizbollah strongholds). But these clips give a false impression of the vul-nerability of the guerrillas that Israel is facing in southern Lebanon. They do not depend on drill halls, arsenals or military emplacements. One reason why there was a build-up of tension in the Israeli-occupied zone over the past few months is that Hizbollah showed that it was becoming very effective. Its ambushes were sophisticated and the South Lebanon Army (SLA), the Israeli-controlled local militia, looked as if it was starting to disintegrate.

Despite the onslaught from the air, and from Israeli heavy artillery, there is no sign that Hizbollah has been hard hit. In recent days the number of Katyusha rockets being fired across the border has actually gone up. They do not do much damage and are mac-curate. Usually they dig a small pot-hole in the ground and break some windows. But Peres has promised to stop them and so far he has not done so. If there have only been six or seven Israeli civilian casualties in the past week, this is partly because local people are in deep shelters. They do not want to stay there. Standing on the roof of the Israeli military headquarters at Marjayoun inside south Lebanon yesterday, Israeli military commanders were con fident that by the end of the operation there would be fewer Katyushas.

'The Katyushas will not be in the same quantity,' says Col Assad. Not quite what Peres promised ...

They will not be in the same quantity," said Colonel Amal Assad. But this is not quite what Peres promised. Colonel Assad also said that there had been no clashes between Hizbollah and Israeli or SLA troops for a week. This could mean that the guerrillas have been hurt by the bornbardment - though this is contradicted by the fact that they continue to fire rockets. Another explanation, more ominous for Israel, is that they are waiting to counter-attack.

If they do so, this will be damaging for Peres. He needs a diplomatic solution in the next few days. He hopes this will come through the United States putting pressure on Syria, which will in turn curb Hizbollah. This is what President Hafez al-Assad of Syria did in 1993, and he may do so again. The problem is that if he does not do it, then it will be difficult for Peres to end Grapes of Wrath successfully. He will come under pressure to use ground troops. But at this point he will be doing what he said he would never do: entangle Israel in a ground war in

For Peres and Israel, Grapes of Wrath is more of a gamble than it looks. For the Israeli public, it is a conflict that appears justified and largely without risks. Few live anywhere near the northern border and most Israelis get their news of the damage done by the Katyusha rockets to life in northern Colling from television and the present Galilee from television and the press. Driving 400,000 people from their homes strikes Lebanese as an attempt to destroy their country - or at least to undermine their attempts to rebuild it after 15 years of war. While for Israelis, the order for people to leave their villages and towns seems like a benign effort to minimise casualties.

The danger for Israel is that the use of excessive force in Lebanon will ultimately be counter-effective. The aim may be to minimise Israeli casualties by using air power and artillery alone. But, as the US learnt in Vietnam and the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, this is seldom effective. It disrupts too many lives; it creates new enemies. Israeli officers insist that they have been employing weapons with pin-point accuracy. But in the past, such claims have turned out to be exaggerated. Peres is trying to increase the pres-sure on Hizbollah, the Lebanese government and Syria by insisting that Grapes of Wrath is open-ended, but if Israel is to achieve its goals in Lebanon then it needs a ceasefire and a diplomatic solution soon.

Some day my prince will say something interesting

Fergie, it is said, found her husband deadly dull. But is the Duke of York really so vacuous? By Jojo Moyes easy-going son-in-law. In an interview with an Italian magazine shortly after their initial sep-aration, she said: "Andrew is a good-looking boy

While owners retire to the members enclosure, the pilots congregate to chat while they wait. Well away from the Queen and other guests in the Royal Box, this is where, at a meeting, one could have found Prince Andrew mucking in with the other pilots, talking about choppers and drinking tea.

This is typical of the popular image of the Duke of York; down to earth, blokeish, "one of the lads". His nickname "Randy Andy" and the tabloid antics of his pre-marriage days suggest a hearty, justy, good-natured individual; a suit-able candidate for Prince Regent.

Even when he was forced to deny persistent unfounded tabloid reports of iliness, his response - "Look at me. I must be the first per-son in medical history to contract Aids and put on weight!" - was typically waggish.

But in the last few years the Duke of York has become less visible; outside his job helping to train Navy helicopter pilots in Portland be has become something of a recluse. As the column inches documenting the lavish lifestyle of his low ex-wife have multiplied, those documenting his own have diminished at a parallel rate. Unlike her, since their separation he has been linked with few romantic partners and no scandal. Friends say there is no significant woman in his life. Unlike her, he has chosen to lead a low-profile, low-key existence; his main indulgence being his passion for golf. Last year he

although he no longer receives anything from the civil list.

In recent years the public seems to have lost sight of Andrew. While it has a good grip on the main characters that make up the royal soap opera - Charles: whingeing, eccentric; Diana: spoilt, neurotic; Anne; blunt, hardworking - it no longer knows what to make of him.

Recent newspaper reports suggest that crucial to his reduced profile is Andrew's growing belief that he may yet have a far more significant role within the Royal Family, should Charles not become King. In recent months he is said to have taken his paper-work "far more seriously" and realised that his marital situation could be an impediment to future role.

But some believe there is less to it than that "Enigmatic is what everyone says about people who are pretty vacuous," says one roval biographer. "He's actually a very 18th-century sort of character. You know, wine, women and song. And why not?" One friend described him as a labrador -

"Every time he wags his tail he knocks over the best china. He's a fairly nice, harmless person." Andrew, those who know him suggest, is neither the rollicking prince, nor the Machiavellian heir apparent. He likes music by Elton John and Fleetwood Mac, he is teetotal and hates smokers, and his idea of a good holiday is with his parents in Scotland.

Fergie is said to have found him dull and boring and balked at his life of sea, golf course and watching television. The Queen, one afternoon, is reported to have jokingly remarked to the Duchess of York: "I'm so glad you've taken Andrew off our hands ... but why on earth did you do it?"

Andrew's widely documented "schoolboy" humour is said to denote a lack of emotional maturity and to be used as way of avoiding any real contact with people. He appears to be most comfortable in the company of men and believes in "anything for a quiet ife". His absence from his wife during their marriage - one year, she says, she saw him for a total of 42 days - suggests someone emotionally semi-

Stavros Niarchos

Stayros Niarchos, the Greek shipowner and art collector, was a self-made businessman of immense wealth and with an exceptional ability to make and waste vast sums of money. Niarchos's short stature (he was only 5ft 5in tall) contrasted with his debonair personality; his middle-class origins with his aristocratic aspirations and staunch royalist sympathies; his commercial acumen in international shipping with his spendthrift involvements in horse-racing, womanising and rivalries for personal grandeur. Stalked by power and riches the world over, he was unable to reconcile his domineering ambitions with the considerations of family life. He brooked no opposition, suffered consequent losses and abandonments but always managed to look tenaciously ahead.

Stavros Niarchos was born in Athens, in 1909, three months after his parents, naturalised US citizens, had returned to their native country on making their fortune with a department store in Buffalo, New York. After graduating in Law at Athens University, he entered the business world through a chain of flour mills owned by his mother's family, the Coumandaros. By the time he was 30 he had built up the shipping side of the business, chartering vessels to carry wheat from Argentina and elsewhere. By 1935 he was able to persuade the company to invest in six freighters for transatlantic grain transport and himself profited from this expansion by acquiring one of them, in 1939. It was an auspicious move. The vessel traded profitably both before and during the Second World War. thus enabling Niarchos to widen his circle of operations to London and New York.

When Greece entered the war, he joined the Royal Hellenic Navy, serving on North Atlantic convoys with the rank of lieutenant-commander, he was later named Honorary Naval Attaché to the Greek embassy in Washington (1944-48). Along with Manuel Kulukundis, C.M. Lemos and others, he was instrumental in securing from the US government the favourable sale of 100 Liberty ships to Greek shipowners in compensation for damages suffered in the Allied war effort. The sale revived the fortunes of Greece's depleted merchant marine and made possible its post-war renascence.

Following the dissolution of his childless second marriage in 1947, Niarchos became a suitor to the shipping tycoon S.G. Livanos's elder daughter, the 21-year-old Eugenia. The Livanos family had been resident in New York since the war and Aristotle Onassis had already proved himself eligible for the hand of the younger daugh-ter. Tina. Eugenia had been brought up with a strong sense of moral duty and familial devotion; in the course of 23 challenging years of marriage she proved an intelligent, dedicated wife and mother.

Niarchos, like most Greek shipowners, had committed all ships under his management to the Allied war effort and lost six of 14 carriers. He retrieved some of his losses through insurance and proceeded to buy US-built Liberty and Victory dry cargo ships, as well as T2 oiltankers. Soon after, he initiated an important shipbuilding programme with American shipyards which increased and consolidated his fleet. His newbuildings were financed by construction loans guaranteed to the banks by the performance of long-term charters. This broke new ground in international ship finance, especially since each ship was regarded as an independent economic unit.

Moreover, Niarchos spearheaded the gradual increase in tanker capacity from the prewar 18,000 tonnes deadweight (d.w.) to the 80,000 d.w. of the late Fifties. His phenomenal success was primarily due to the early realisation that oil would replace coal as the primary fuel of the world economy. 'I am first-generation Niarchos," he used to boast in answer to accusations of unfair competition by the traditional shinowners of the time. By 1956 Niarchos's fleet was the largest in the world, with 60 ships trading and on order, totalling almost 2 million tonnes. In 1959-60 he was able to procure massive contracts with the Soviet government for the carriage of Black Sea oil to Japan, Scandinavia and Italy. Although he was criticised by the English press for providing the Communists with what amounted to a captive fleet, thus allowing Russian tankers to supply and strengthen Cuba at the peak of the Cold War, Niarchos defended his decision in court and was granted a full apology on the grounds that his contracts were in no way detrimental to Western defence interests and that, as an international businessman, he had the right to trade freely.

72 ships trading and 16 on or-der, including substantial modern and super tonnage. His investments had diversified into stocks and real estate. His art collection had grown impressively, especially after the 1958 acquisition of Edward G. Robinson's excellent collection of Impressionist paintings. It now included works by Corot, Renoir, Degas, Toulouse-Lautrec, Gauguin, Cézanne, Utrillo and Picasso, as well as the magnificent 1585 Pietà by El Greco. He owned fabulous homes in St Moritz, New York, Antibes and Paris, where he had renovated the 18th-century Hôtel de Chanalleiles, once pre-sented by Louis XIV to his son the Duc de Maine. In 1962 Niarchos bought the island of Spetsopoula, 53 miles south of Piraeus, and started transforming it from a heap of windswept rocks into an Aegean paradise of lush greenery, gy and communications. The marriage with Eugenia was interrupted rudely in 1964 on account of Niarchos's tumultuous affair with Charlotte Ford, the 24-year-old daughter of Henry Ford II. They were married in Mexico and had one child. After this escapade came to a bitter end in 1967, Niarchos retraced his steps to Eugenia with impunity - the Greek Orthodox Church had never dissolved their wedlock.

Three years later, Eugenia died from an overdose of barbiturates while holidaying on Spetsopoula. The Piraeus public prosecutor challenged medical reports and accused Niarchos of inflicting fatal in-juries on his wife. There were allegations at the time of a high-level cover-up which Niarchos had ostensibly engineered with the collusion of the military junta ruling Greece. It was well known that he, like Onas-sis, maintained close relations with the Colonels and was active in bringing badly needed investments into the country. A judicial tribunal heard the case in September 1970 and exonerated Niarchos.

Vindicated and relieved, he renewed his friendship with his wife's sister. Tina, recently divorced from her second husband, the Marquess of Bland-By 1966 his fleet comprised ford. They were married in 1971 with the approval of the bride's mother, Mme Arietta Livanos. The grand old lady is reputed to have told them that their marriage would not only show the world that Niarchos was innocent of Eugenia's death but also that the family had stuck together in the face of adversity. Her words challenged fate: two years later Tina's son, Alexandros Onassis, crashed in his private jet and the year following Tina herself died in Paris of a heart attack.

Niarchos was a world-class entrepreneur with a special flare for public relations. After accepting late delivery of two 260,000-d.w. supertankers from British Shipbuilders in 1978-80, he was accused of taking advantage of British taxpavers' money: the vessels had been ordered at £17m each, including £4m in government subsidies. Contractual terms entitled Niarchos to a £4m reduction on each vessel and BS had agreed to let go of the second vessel at £14m. Peeved by Tory accusations in Parliament, Niarchos announced he was ready to reverse the purchase and sell the tankers back to the yard at the original price, forgoing interest. BS found the offer embarrassing and chose to sidestep it.

Niarchos was a firm believer in hard work and fair play. He always maintained close ties with his native Greece and. in addition to operating most of his fleet under the Greek flag, invested heavily in the country's industrial base. It is probably through no fault of his own that two of his major enterprises, the Aspropyrgos Oil Refinery and the Hellenic Shipyards at Skaramanga, came to no good. Government intervention, union interference with overmanning problems and the oil crisis, followed by the prolonged shipping crisis of 1981-86, forced him to

had always been regarded by Greek socialists as a bête noire and had to endure the calumnies of adverse publicity and incessant litigation. In 1985 he characteristically offered Hellenic Shipyards to the stateowned Industrial Development Bank for $10m, one-tenth its book value, thus assessing the company's negative worth in terms of labour unrest and minimal productivity at $90m. The socialist government of Andreas Papandreou snapped up the bargain. Niarchos's frivolous side included an impulsive sortie into racing reputed to have cost him $100m, as well as a number of liaisons amoureuses during his autumnal years with ch famous socialites as Ellen d'Estain Ville, Princess Firyal of Jordan and the Italian heiress Marina Palma. At different times he owned the world's most expensive private jet, a Grumman Gulfstream 2 (then valued at £1m), and the world's most huxurious yacht, the fabulous 3,600-ton Atlantis. His net worth has been estimated at

Michael Moschos

Successful in business, successful in racing, writes Richard Griffiths. Stavros Niarchos was a man who enjoyed his fair share of achievements in both spheres. For a period spanning three decades, Niarchos's navy and pale blue colours were as well known as any.

His standard-bearer was a lain-looking filly called Miesque, who belied her appearance to become one of the most outstanding milers racing has seen. Two years running she won the Breeders' Cup Mile in North America. The end-ofseason championship series is regarded as extremely difficult for runners from Europe to win; it says everything for the talent of Miesque, and her trainer François Boutin, that she was able to achieve the feat twice.

Niarchos first became involved in racing in the 1950s and his Midas touch immediately became apparent with Oleandrin. a leading two-year-old in 1952 who went on to finish third as a three-year-old in the 2000 Guineas. Four years later Pipe of Peace, another top two-yearold, also went on to finish third

Soon after Niarchos's interest in racing began to wane, and it was not until the 1980s that he really became a force again. That coincided with his purchase of a former leading stud in France, the Haras de Fresnayle-Buffard, whose fortunes Niarchos, backed by a team of able advisers, revived. The stud also became a leading race sponsor, backing the Prix Jacques le Marois, the highlight of the big Deauville meeting in Niarchos's investment soon paid off with back-to-back successes in the French 2,000 Guineas with Melyno in 1992 and L'Emigrant in 1993. Later, between 1991 and 1993, he achieved an unprecedented hattrick of wins in the same race with Hector Protector, Shanghai and Kingmambo. Other leading colts he owned were Machiavellian and the French Derby-winner Hernando.

All these horses were trained by the late François Boutin, without whom it is questionable Niarchos would have enjoyed such success. The brilliant Miesque, as well as those two fabulous Breeders' Cup wins, also won the English 1,000 Guineas in 1987 and the Prix du Moulin, another big mile race. Niarchos had horses with British trainers, most notably ented fillies like Gwydion and Chimes of Freedom. In the Eighties Niarchos went into short-lived partnership with another leading owner, Robert Sangster. Law Society was among the best of their horses, winning the Irish Derby in 1985. Niarchos's biggest disappointment as a racehorse owner came in 1980 when his talented but unlucky colt Nureyev was disqualified from first place in the 2,000 Guineas.

Stavros Spyros Niarchos, shipowner, an collector, racehorse owner: born Athens 3 July 1909; married 1930 Helen Sporides (marriage dissolved 1930), 1939 Melpomene Capparis (marriage dissolved 1947), 1947 Eugenia Livanos (died 1970; three sons. one daughter), 1965 Charlotte Ford (one daughter; marriage dissolved 1967), 1971 Mrs Athina 1974); died Zurich 15 April best-known film-maker, was an ardent supporter of the 1959 revolution - which, in one form or another, was the subject of most of his films. He could be fanciful on occasion, but on the whole his work was a counterblast to Stalin's dictum - "Life must be depicted as it should be, not as it is." In 36 years Alea made only il features, and the best of them is the fifth, Memories of Underdevelopment (Memorias del subdesarrollo, 1968). It is not only the finest, but the largest in theme when he wasn't paying homage to his predecessors chiefly Bunuel, whose work (in common with most Latin-American film-makers) he idolised. It is by far the most successful of his films, which makes him something of an enigma. The revolution both stimulated him and restricted him. Alea read Law at Havana

University and then went to study at the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica in Rome, founded by Mussolini. He began making shorts in Cuba in 1955, one of which was seized by the Batista government for subversion. After Castro deposed Batista, Alea was the leading force behind the creation of the Cuban Film Institute, the ICAIC, with whom he made his first feature in 1960, Stories of the Revolution (Historias de la Revolución), three linked stories of the insurrection against Batista: it was filmed on sellini's Paisà as its model - but unlike that, and his own subsequent films, it clearly cost a lot of money. The Twelve Chairs (Las Doce Sillas, 1962) is based on the comic Russian novel by Ilya Ilf and Yevgeny Petrov which at other times has provided vehicles for Fred Allen, George Formby, Mel Brooks and others. It was basically a scattershot satire on the bureaucracy created by the revolution, a constant theme in Alea's work. Gumbite (1964), showed him in a more humanist mood, as a young Haitian returns from Cuba to his native village, with echoes of both Shakespeare (Romeo and Juliet) and Pagnol/ Giono (Manon des Sources).

Death of a Bureaucrat (La muerte de un hurocrata, 1966) concerns a widow who needs to produce a body before she can collect a pension. She asks her hapless nephew to help her and his response is to steal a cadaver. He manages to be more resourceful than we are led to expect, but he ends up as Harold Lloyd cast in the role of Josef K; unlike Lloyd, however, the slapstick is very much hitand-run. The film is dedicated to many people in the movies' past, from Eisenstein to Laurel and Hardy, but this only exposes Alea's chief weakness - his dependence on past masters.

Viridiana and to The Exterminating Angel, mordant essays on a bourgeoisie trying to shake off the yoke of a religion which denies its members their sexuality. (It's to Bunuel, in fact, that the latter is dedicated.) Alea is not alone in this. In Spain, its leading directors of this generation - Juan Antonio Bardem and Luis G. Berlanga laboured under the shadow of the master.

When they were serious, they were almost as sardonic and sharp-minded as he was, but they both threw everything but the kitchen stove into their later comedies. Discernment is the major requirement of political

That was something Bunuel understood even in his Mexican potboilers. Alea's final film, Guantanamera (1995), echoed the plotting of Buffuel's Subida al Cielo, as several incompetents make life even more difficult for themselves as they travel across the country, but where he was pitiless Alea was phobia than machismo. In Cuba under Castro gays didn't exist - or else, like the great cinematographer Nestor Almendros, they were driven abroad. Alea was much praised everywhere for tackling a contro-versial issue, but in fact his hero, Diego, is one of the old stereotypes, an effemmate man who conceives a passion for straight man. David. He is tempted to succumb - but not often and not much, and he reasserts his heterosexuality with a grand bout on Diego's bed with a whore, played by Alea's wife, Mirta lbarra.

The film cops out, despite its sentimentality - a quality distinctly absent from Alea's masterpiece, Memories of Underdevelopment. He wrote it himself from a novel by Edmundo Desnoes, who actually appears in it, in a public debate as to whether he is using the country for his own ends or is simply failing to understand it. The time is 1961, and Sergio (Sergio Corrieri), prosperous and well-placed, is staying on as wife, friends and family flee to Miami: he believes - it is more than a creed - that he must come to terms with the new regime. To that end, he keeps a diary. He has a casual affair with a girl from a different class who is bitter about losing her virginity; she begins to love him, but accuses him of rape after he has tried to end the relationship.

With her. I'm dogged by underdevelopment." They visit Hemingway's home - his refuge, it is said, though, ambiguously. Cuba never really interested him: his bullfighter posters might, perhaps, express a sublimated homosexuality rather than macho man. It is a movie about the past, present and future not only of Sergio though he is not atypical - but of Cuba itself, a mighty collage of newsreels (the actualité), of memories and fantasies. There is no other film quite like it, and certainly not the nostalgic Letters from the Park (Cartas del parquee. 1988). though that is also the work of a clever and sophisticated film-maker. As adapted from Gabriel Garcia Marquez, it is a retreat to a peaceful provincial 1913, when a young man finds himself losing his beloved to the older man who is writing his love-letters for him.

These days television sometimes commemorates deceased movie-makers with their finest work. Both these films should be shown - and, because of its flashes of brilliance, La ultima cena. This is a director whose work, even the sub-Bunuel pieces, ought to be better

A dramatic

Electricity merger: Government will seek disposal of power stations as the price for allowing £8bn marriage with US group

Power deal will mean shake-up

MICHAEL HARRISON and MARY FAGAN

The Government is preparing to use its golden share in National Power to engineer a dramatic shake-up in Britain's electricity industry in return for allowing the America power company Southern to proceed with a £8bn-plus merger.
As a political row erupted over Southern's announcement that it is seeking a "combination" with National Power, it emerged that the Georgiabased company could dispose of a significant number of power stations as the price for getting regulatory approval for the National Power, Britain's eiggest electricity generator, las already agreed to sell off 4,000 megawatts of plant - accounting for more than 15 per cent of its capacity - and has shortlisted four buyers.

But Southern, which bought South Western Electricity for £1.1bn last year, is thought to be prepared to get rid of more of National Power's stations, as a way of increasing competition and securing Government support for the merger.

Southern is not thought to have formally sounded out ministers about its interest in National Power, although it has been eyeing the generator for almost a year.

National Power shares soared by more than 10 per cent to 578p yesterday as Southern confirmed its interest in the generator, while PowerGen, the other big generator, rose 29p to 599p on specultion that it too might be bid for by an overseas utility. Southern said it would not make any further move until the Government had decided whether to approve bids by National Power and PowerGen for the two regional electricity companies, Southern Electric and Midlands Electricity.

But analysts and industry observers believe it is ready to package its offer in a way that will win the support of the National Power chairman John Baker.

National Power issued a state-

The statement fell a long way short of a firm rebuttal of Southern's overtures. But National Power advisers stressed that it should not be read as opening the door to an agreed warning that this latest development was "potentially disastrous" for consumers and for competition.

A spokesman added that the electricity sector could rapidly fall under the control of a few powerful groups, opening up the possibility of anti-competitive practices and unfair cross-subsidy. Southern's intentions were sprung on National Power's top executives at a hurriedly convened meeting on Tuesday evening, which went on late into the night. City sources said

MICHAEL HARRISON

A merger between Southern Company of Georgia and National Power would represent the most dramatic change of ownership in the electricity industry since it was privatised six years ago. Britain's biggest power generator falling under the control of America's largest quoted electricity utility might still seem improbable. But it would be a logical continuation of the consolidation that has seen the electricity industry starting to be carved up between a small number of large players in the last year.

If the respective takeovers of Southern Electric (no relation) and Midlands Electricity by National Power and PowerGen go ahead, then only four of the 12 regional electricity companies that were sold off in 1990 will still be independent.

Moreover, the industry will be dominated by a handful of large, well-capitalised groups generating, distributing and supplying electricity. In addition to the enlarged

National Power and Power-Gen, there will be Scottish Power, which now owns Manhaving taken the generator by web, the distributor for Merseyside and North Wales, and Hanson, which owns Eastern Electricity and could emerge with 10 per cent of Britain's power stations if it succeeds in buying plants from the two big are any left to snap up.

This is a structure that the Government could have adopted when it dismantled and sold off the Central Electricity Generating Board in 1990. Instead it chose to break the link between generation and supply by floating the 12

RECs as separate companies. At the time there was widespread criticism of the structure adopted by ministers and the price the industry fetched. That has merely grown as executive directors have been rewarded with massive share option bonanzas and customers have become poor cousins to shareholders beaped with special dividends and other incentives.

There is every indication that ministers are content to see the emergence of a few giant integrated utilities, believing it to be a better guarantor of consumer choice and lower prices as the domestic electricity industry prepares for full competition in two years time. From April, 1998 the counry's 22 million domestic electricity customers will, in theory, be able to switch off from their local REC and shop around for supplies. The increasing level of competition in generation and the opening up of the franchise market is what has propelled the generators to snap up suppliers.

The prospect of a full-blown merger between Southern Company and National Power would add an extra dimension. It would also open up the prospect of PowerGen being acquired by an overseas utility.

The windfall would come on top of pay-offs for executive directors of up to £3.12m if the US group decided to clear out the entire board, and profits on existing shareholdings valued at £1.24m.

The biggest winner from the payments, based on figures dating from March 1995, is likely to be Granville Camsey, the managing director of group technology, who stands to gain a £1.14m profit from options and a pay-off of up to £384,000.

John Baker, who moved up from chief executive to chairman a year ago, would make £883,000 from options.

Meanwhile, his shareholding last year would be worth nearly £622,000. By contrast, Keith Henry,

National Power's new chief executive who joined from the US group Brown & Root last year, would only be in line for a pay-off worth twice his £280,000 annual salary or £560,000.

He was not offered anv share options when he joined, but he used a controversial £100,000 "golden hello" given by the company to buy £60,000 of National Power shares. Those are likely to have appreciated substantially since his April 1995 appointment date. He would also be due an element of performance-related bonus which entitles him to up to 40 per cent of his basic

Deal would face many hurdles

Last July a senior executive of Southern Company confided that it had considered launching a bid for National Power only to conclude that it would be biting off more than it could chew, writes Michael Harrison.

He was speaking the day pany had decided to limit its ambitions to a £1.1bn takeover of South Western Electricity.

Ten months on, size is apparently no longer a stumbling block. But if the £7.5bn merger of Southern and National Power is to proceed then it will have to overcome a mountain of regulatory and political hurdles in both Britain and the US.

The regulatory obstacles on both sides of the Atlantic are onerous. Even if Southern does sell off a large minority stake in Sweb, the deal will raise objections from the electricity regulator Professor Stephen Littlechild, and possibly the Office of Fair Trading, because of the vertical integration that

This might not necessarily mean an automatic referral to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which has already given the go-ahead for two electricity bids that would involve much greater vertical integration.

However, the inevitable political uproar that would ensue, along with opposition from the consumer lobby, might oblige the Trade and Industry Secretary, Ian Lang, to pack the bid off to the MMC on vaguer public interest grounds.

I he Government also has a indefinite golden share in National Power which enables it to block any takeover of the company. The veto, which restricts a single investor to no more than 15 per cent of the generator, would have to be lifted.

On the only previous occasion when a golden share was put to the test - in Ford's takeover of Jaguar - the Government chose not to use its right of veto.

Given National Power's position as Britain's biggest electricity generator and holder of strategic fuel stocks, the issue of national interest could arise. But it seems unlikely that the Government would use this weapon. The only time in the last 20 years that the national interest has been invoked by ministers was when the Kuwaitis were instructed to reduce their shareholding in British Petroleum after its privatisation in the 1980s. So the regulatory morass in the UK, though daunting, is not insuperable.

City braced for £3bn overshoot on government borrowing

EDIANE COYLE Economics Editor

Figures for government borrowing last month which will be published today are set to end the Government's run of good luck on news about the economy. Most City economists expect them to show it overran its £29bn borrowing target for 1995/96 by about £3bn, casting doubt on the scope for tax cuts. Retail price figures also due

The number of people on unemployment benefit has fallen by 794,500 from the peak of just under 3 million in December 1992. Analysts think the transfer of people from invalidity to memployment benefit could slow the pace of decline in the claimant count.

IMF report warns UK against further rate cuts

Washington

The International Monetary Fund is urging Germany to cut interest rates again to revive its flagging economy. However, the Fund said yesterday that the recent and unexpectedly severe economic slowdown in Europe was probably over, and Britain for one should not reduce its rates further unless its current gradual recovery began to weaken sharply.

The IMF, whose managing di-rector is Michael Camdessus. singles out industrialised Europe in general in the report and the hard currency countries in the de facto mark zone in particular - as the main blots on an encouraging global economic largely behind us, and a pick up should be visible from the first quarter of 1996," Michael Mussa, director of the Fund's research department, said vesterday when presenting the latest issue of the Fund's twice yearly World Economic Outlook. It depicts a strengthening Japanese economy, modest but steady growth in the US, and a continuing surge in Asia - albeit at "only" 8.2 per cent this year, fractionally below 1995's 8.4 per

Even so, the differences in performance between countries with currencies gravitating around the mark, and "devaluers" like Britain and Italy have been enough to revive the debate over exchange rate policy and growth. Conversely, Germany comes in for criticism for its refusal to lower rates further and faster as the slowdown grew more serious last year. To facilitate a robust recovery in Europe now, the hard currency group must seize today's chance of reducing rates. With untypical bluntness, the report writes: "Room for further reductions in short term rates in these countries is suggested by their large margins of slack, subdued price pressures, the strength of their exchange rates and the slow growth of monetary aggregates."

Indeed the Fund warns that the 1997 budget deficit targets may not of themselves be enough. It urges criteria linked to a longer period, and "bind-

Petplan aims new credit card at 14 million owners

NIC CICUTTI

Petplan, the specialist pet insurance provider, yesterday announced plans to target the UK's 14 million owners of cats. dogs and other assorted animal species with its own credit card offering a competitive rate of 18.9 per cent.

The company hopes to attract a significant slice of customers for its card from the one in two households in Britain that own a pet. Anyone switching balances from an existing card will receive a preferential rate of 13.9 per cent APR for the first six months. No annual fee is being charged for the Petplan card. As an additional incentive, potential cardholders are being offered a choice of cards with pictures of a cat, dog or horse

Paul Cosgrove, commercial director at Petplan, said: We have about 400,000 policyholders taking out insurance with us. What we find is that they are very concerned about animals and care for them.

This is an important market." Petplan's announcement marks the latest twist in an increasingly diversified card war, with a number of new entrants moving in to challenge traditional issuers by offering more competitive rates.

Big banks, including Bar-clays, National Westminster, Lloyds and Midland, have long cornered the bulk of the market despite charging between 22 and 23.4 per cent APR. Most also charge an annual fee of £10

In the past few months several aggressive newcomers have grabbed a small share of cards being issued by offering slightly more competitive rates.

Good news for the Liberal Democrats. Last week they were hopping mad that the Railtrack flotation prospectus, to be published this Monday, was to contain a warning from the Labour Party on its plans to retake control of the network if it got into power. Understandably, the Lib Dems wanted their own proposals for reasserting control over the country's rail net sork and duly demanded that SBC Warburg include their own blurb in the prospectus. Happily the bankers complied. But hang on. The Lib Dems' plans get under one page, while Labour gets three, Must be proportional representation.

Compass pips rival to control of Eurest

MAGNUS GRIMOND

Compass of the UK was yesterday confirmed as the world's biggest contract-catering group after reaching agreement to acquire a controlling stake in Eurest France, the third-largest caterer in that country. The acquisition, pipping arch-rivals Sodexho of France, means Compass will have complete coverage of Europe's largest catering markets.

No price was put on the deal, but Sodexho said last week that it was willing to pay Fr694m (£90m)for the one third management stake which Compass is set to acquire.

It follows a vote late on Tuesday by the managers of Eurest France to sell Compass their 33 per cent shareholding, carrying voting rights over 57.9 per cent of the equity. The decision in effect gives the British group control over the group. Compass already owns a one third stake as a result of its £589m acquisition last year of a controlling interest in Eurest International from Accor. the French hotels group.

Sodexho, which owns the remaining 33 per cent of Eurest France, was disgruntled by the Compass victory in the race to acquire Eurest International. It said then that it was "surprised" not to be informed in advance of the sale and has subsequently taken legal action against Accor. It was involved in separate negotiations to acquire the French business.

Shares in Compass dipped 2p to 545p yesterday, but many analysts welcomed the deal. France has been seen as the biggest gap in the European operations of Compass.

Smiths reads the runes right

Sir Roger Hurn, chairman and chief executive of Smiths Industries, the medical equipment and engineering group. is living testimony to the benefits of thinking strategically. After 38 years with Smiths, he reads the runes right in aerospace, anticipating the 1990s downturn in the civil market long before others in the industry. The result is that although Smiths has spent nearly £400m on acquisitions over the past five years, none has been in its aerospace division. The results of that spending spree came through in yesterday's figures showing pre-tax profits soaring 19 per cent to £69.5m in the six months to 3 £11.5m rise in operating profits to £70.4m came from acquisitions, including a maiden conbought in June and over film banks' bill from Level 1 Technologies, the US medical systems oper-

But if medical systems and industrial divisions have made all the running in recent years, aerospace is set to take up the baton in the rest of the decade and beyond.

The recent multi-billion dollar orders for the new Boeing 777 aircraft from the likes of Singapore, Malaysia and Korea will keep Smiths busy for years. Its avionics are worth $400,000 a plane, with spares on top. Meanwhile, existing work on the 737 is set to soar over the next four years as orders double from this year's 76 and Smiths expects to ride out the worst of the recent strike at the US plane maker.

Margins at FRB have al-ready been raised into double figures from the 9 per cent shopfitting which followed the boom on the high street in the 1980s. Most of its larger rivals have either been gobbled up or fallen by the wayside and Havelock itself went through magic. Deltec, the US infusion pumps business picked up in 1994, has already seen its mar

Its development of a novel way of fitting out banks more quickly and efficiently made a breakthrough when the Bank of Scotland gave it a big contract to revivify its branch network. Last year it did 56 outlets and nearly quadrupled turnover from the banking and financial division to £24.4m. This year it expects to

Meanwhile, turnover in the traditional non-food retail business slipped from £31m to £28.4m as work for Boots and Marks & Spencer reduced for this year by a record contract worth a little under £10m for a new House of Fraser store in Swindon and a firsttime contribution from Showing businesses. Kwik-Fit on target

It is only a month since Tom Farmer, chairman of Kwik-Fit announced plans to open 100 new centres this year alongside a 24 per cent increase in profits. He is halfway to that target already after yesterday's deals to buy 45 centres in the South and South-west of England for a total of £7m.

The acquisitions represent part of Kwik-Fit's strategy to buy up strong regional brand names which will keep trading under their existing formats, despite competing with local Kwik-Fit outlets. The group has had the Budget brand in Scotland for years and last November it bought a chain in from cyclical peaks. That Birmingham. Yesterday's acshould be more than made up quisitions are strong in Bristol quisitions are strong in Bristol and Gloucester and further

The takeover could be made conditional on National Power selling a lot more of its generating capacity than presently envisaged. It would thus enhance competition rather than dilute it'

No reason for the Government to block this deal An English National Opera board meet-ling followed by a congenial dinner with fellow directors is not the most suitable of backdrops for considering the future of Britain's electricity industry. That was where John Baker, chairman of National Power, was rushing off to on Tuesday night when he first heard of the American bid interest in his company. Even a few years ago, he probably wouldn't have allowed it to spoil his evening too much - the bid threat might not have been taken seriously at all. Southern Company of the US would politely have been told to get lost and Mr Baker could have been confident he would have full political backing for his stance.

These days it is not so simple. News of Southern's intentions brought the usual knee-jerk condemnation from Labour and a few "bad business, this" mutterings from the Tory backbenches. But it is a measure of how far attitudes have changed that the prospect of a foreign takeover of Britain's largest power generating company could have resulted in such a subdued political reaction. Does it really matter any longer in this age of global markets and corporations whether our industries are British owned? Ten years ago it would certainly have been under foreign ownership, and plenty of others thrive. In any case, while National Power is plainly still the most powerful force in the British electricity market, it does not hold the same pivotal position it once did. Its share of the market, already down from more than a half six years ago to a quarter now, is being forcibly further reduced to just 20 per cent over the next couple of years. None the less, there are clearly public policy issues involved in such a takeover. Southern already owns the regional distribution company, South Western Electricity, so its takeover involves a degree of vertical integration of previously segrated distribution and generating businesses. That issue is about to be resolved by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in favour of generators who want to buy distribution companies. Even if ministers wanted to block the Americans on grounds of vertical integration, therefore, they would be hard pressed

provided our companies remain properly run and regulated in a publicly accountable way. Some businesses, notably the car industry, have enjoyed a positive renaissance over any National Power takeover to extract over any National Power Indeed big concessions from the Americans. Indeed this seems to be the most likely and sensible way forward for the Government. The takeover would be made conditional on National Power selling a lot more of its generating capacity than presently envisaged The takenver would thus enhance competition rather than dilute it. At this stage, Mr Baker is keeping his door gently ajar to the American approach. Southern seems to be genuine in its promise of a proper merger with a serious position for the British company in the combined group, though this is tempered with the threat that if it has to, it will go hostile. It is easy to be sceptical about Southern's smooth-talking banter, to dismiss its talk of all the supposed benefits of a global part-nership as little more than a cover for good old-fashioned American imperialism. But it would be wrong to do so.

Southern is prepared to be as accommodating as it has to in its determination to bring about this marriage. If the sort of structure that allowed the merger of Britain's thought so. These days? Well, maybe not, in National Power. The golden share was put Beecham with SmithKline of the US, or

Reed with Elsevier of Holland, has to be put in place, so be it. There is no reason for the Government to block this deal; nor, if the deed in the three months to February, added in the three months to February. in place, so be it. There is no reason for the Government to block this deal; nor, if the price is right, are there apparent reasons why National Power should oppose it.

Part-time boom will not win the election

It seems almost churlish to find fault in the remarkable reduction in unemployment revealed by yesterday's figures. Ministers, rightly in some respects, see their achievement in bringing Britain's unemployment rate below the European average as key evidence of the success of the Government's approach to managing the economy. Britain's deregulated, flexible labour market has not been created without a good deal of pain, but there is surely some reason for believing the economy is about to emerge strengthened by the Conservative surgery.

Unemployment - even on the interna-tionally accepted definition, not just the manipulated headline count - has now been in retreat for four years. That must be some kind of vindication of policy. But the Government should beware of too much triumphalism. The new figures are not unam-

75,000 could be identified as part-time jobs for women, 13,000 as part-time jobs for men, and 24,000 full time (18,000 men and 6,000 women). Part-time work is real work and suits many women, but it is hardly a sign of a booming economy if it accounts for threequarters of all new employment. City economists see the predominance of part-time work as a good reason for expecting wage rises, and inflation, to remain subdued. In many industries underlying earnings growth is at a record low. So if there is to be the recovery in consumer spending predicted by the Chancellor, it is unlikely to be fed by big rises in pay.

A modest improvement in the economy based on a lot of part-time and temporary jobs are hardly enough to return him to Number 11.

Unfortunately for the Conservatives, just as people only realise that they were happy when they have become unhappy, they will only feel good about the economy long after we have all stopped having to hunt for the feelgood factor. Politically, there is not much in these figures for the Government

Pension redress too slow, says PIA

NIC CICUTTI

The Personal Investment Authority, the financial services regulator, yesterday warned thousands of its members that they face disciplinary action if they fail to deliver quick compensation to victims of the pension transfer scandal.

The warning came as the PIA admitted that out of almost 400,000 so-called priority cases which should have been dealt with by the end of last year, just 7,000 investors have been offered redress.

About 6,000 of those offers came from independent financial advisers. Big insurers, banks and building societies who have 270,000 priority cases between them, had only offered redress in 1.000 instances.

Joe Palmer, chairman of the PIA, said yesterday: "[We] will not allow the situation to drift. Firms which are found not to be devoting sufficient time and resources to the review will be disciplined. The penalties will match their failure.

"We know that there have process which are outside our control. But it is clear that last year as the target date by progress is not as good in some cases as it should be."

A PIA spokesman added that likely disciplinary action included fines, or even suspension from trading where necessary.

Mr Palmer's comments follow the first reports to the PIA by members of the progress reached in the pension transfer review at the end of December

The review, initially ordered by the Securities and Investments Board, the City's leading watchdog, followed an investigation which showed that up to 1.5 million people might have been missold a personal pension.

The reports show that of nearly 1.1 million cases so far indentified as requiring investigation, more than 390,000 are classed as priorities, higher than original estimates.

As well as insurers, big banks and building societies contributed more than 60,000 of those cases, compared with 16,000 from large independent financial advice firms with a national network of offices, been delays to the review and 43,000 from small IFAs.

which the vast majority of priority cases, then thought to number about 350,000, had to be reviewed.

Among cases deemed urgent are those where a pension plan holder is dead or close to retirement, or where a person was wrongly advised to opt out of an occupational scheme while still in that company's employment. Despite the regulator's hopes, the review became rapidly bogged down in a series of lengthy delays, caused by legal action, computer problems and threats by specialist insurers to invalidate the cover of advisers who sent out letters referring to compensation.

The PIA hopes that now the process has begun in earnest, returns for the first three months of this year, set to be published in the summer, will show a significant improvement in cases

Roddy Kohn, an independent adviser at Bristol-based Kohn Cougar, said his firm had only one pension problem to clear up: "Generally, consumers can take some comfort from the fact The PIA set 31 December that advisers appear to be the Prudential's figures were boosted by sales of annuitylinked products, together with its well-established Prudence Bond. In addition, PEP sales grew by 67 per cent to £47m.

ed by rising house prices and a return of the "feel-good factor". Commercial Union, the com-posite insurer, said it expected its own profits to grow this year. John Cowan, sales and marketing general manager at Scottish Amicable, said: There is a definite feeling within the TIBM, the world's biggest maker of computers, reported a nigher-than-expected increase in first-quarter earnings and poosted its dividend by 40 per cent to 35 cents, the first increase in seven years. Net income rose by 4.7 per cent to $1.29bn (£855m), achieved on a 5.2 per cent increase in sales to $16.56bn. Louis Gerstner, chairman, said: "We turned in a good, but uneven quarter. Overall hardware revenues and margins were disappointing. There was weak demand for personal computers in the US, and price pressures in many areas.

IN BRIEF

 Woolwich Building Society announced a 200,000 drop in the numbers of people in negative equity in the first quarter of 1996, down to 960,000. The figures mirror a survey last week by Swiss banking group UBS. Negative equity levels, where a mortgage is more than the value of as home, fell in every area of the UK except the East Midlands, where a 0.8 per cent drop in house prices added 10,000 more households to the total.

Scotch whisky's position as one of the UK's top five manufacturing export earners was reinforced yesterday by record export figures, for the twelfth year running, of £2.3bn in 1995. The per cent rise in the value of exports was matched by similar growth in the volume of whisky sent overseas. The Scotch Whisky Association said the equivalent of 935 million bottles were exported last year, the largest volume since the peak years of 1978 and 1979.

 Ford Motor's first-quarter earnings dived 58 per cent to $653m (£433m). The result, however, was better than analysts had been expecting following the company's warning at the start of the year. The results were hit by the costs of launching the F-150, and the restyling of the Ford Escort and Mercury Tracer models.

 Signet, the jewellery group that is selling its H Samuel and Ernest Jones chains, unveiled a sparking trading performance yesterday though no news on the impending sale. Profits tripled last year to £25m boosted by strong performances from the re-furbished Ernest Jones chain and a recovery in the US Sterling Hoare Govert, the investment banking division of ABN Amro. the Dutch bank, opened a new bond trading operation in the City with 200 dealer positions. The company said the move was in keeping with an integrated approach to fixed income and derivatives products, with London-based activities linked to those in Amsterdam, where it has 350 dealers. It forms part of the move towards globalisation, with plans to set up similar centres in Chicago and Singapore. ABN Amro also said all corporate and investment banking operations in London would be centralised in a new building at Spitaifields to be completed in 1999.

Andi, the up-market subsidiary of Volkswagen, saw group sales climb 20.5 per cent to a provisional £2.1 bn in the first quarter of the current year from £1.7bn a year earlier. It had a 1995 pretax profit of £262bn, up from £84m the previous year.

Erik Tonseth, chief executive of Kvaerner of Norway, is to take over daily operational responsibility in Trafalgar House from today. Its offer to Trafalgar House shareholders is now unconditional with acceptances in respect of 92 per cent of ordinary shares.

Lloyd's loses to 'radicals'

JOHN EISENHAMMER Financial Editor

Lloyd's of London's hopes of putting off a court hearing that could seriously upset its settlement plans were dashed yes terday when Lord Justice Scott sided with radical names.

The bearing begins today and is expected to last until early next week, despite a concerted attempt by Lloyd's and moder-ate names to have the matter put off for fear it will disrupt the recovery plan negotiations in their crucial final stage.

The hearing centres on the legality of changes made by Lloyd's to so-called Premium Trust Deeds, which meant that any money won by litigating names would have to be used first to pay off all losses at the insurance society. Government approval for this change was given only on the condition that Lloyd's have its legality tested in the courts.

However, with the negotiations on the global settlement to Lloyd's problems fast near-ing their deadline, and the recent news that the society has increased by £300m its £2.8bn offer to names, a deal was struck between the society and the majority of names' representatives to put off the legal test hearing. "There was a strong feeling among most names that we did not want anything that could unnecessarily eopardise the settlement," a leading name said.

But radical names, some of whom are determined to scupper the settlement, reacted angrily, and argued to Lord Justice Scott that the hearing should proceed. Yesterday, he announced his agreement with that line of argument.

Fading rate hopes and profit-taking cast a damper For a few minutes it looked as though blue chips would con-

After all, National Power was indeed engulfed in takeover action, reinforcing the theory that an ever-in-

tinue their heroic progress, creasing rush of deals would push the FT-SE 100 index to 4,000 points by mid-summer. But, not for the first time, the stock market decided to illustrate just how perverse it can be. Instead of dwelling on possible bid action it succumbed to a weak gilts market and fretted about fading hopes of lower interest rates. With the temptation to snatch profits in some of the long-running takeover candi-dates proving irresistible, Footsie, after an early gain of 12.2 points, relapsed to close 19.7

push ahead, climbing 5.6 to a record 4,464.1.

NP had another electrifying session. The shares closed 56.5p higher at 578p. There was a stampede to trade with many small deals going through and one investor pay-ing 620p for 10,000 shares. Seaq put volume at 25.7 million. The partly-paid shares gained 57p to 444p.

Worries that it was, perhaps, a deal too far and the multitude of regulatory problems could prove too much for the Southern Co, the US predator, prompted a round of afternoon profit-taking. PowerGen surged in sympathy. The shares rose 29p to 599p; the partly-paid 26.5p to 459p. Other utilities had a much more mundane session. Southern Electric, the subject of an NP bid, fell 33p to 852p on worries the US intervention could scupper the deal. Waters subsided with South

Lsay that computers and new communications technologies are revolutionising the industrial economies. But beyond the obneed a more highly skilled workforce, detailed analysis of the economic implications is pretty scarce. What does it mean to say we are becoming a knowledge-based economy?

There are some welcome attempts to close this knowledge gap. The key to understanding the transformation is the "dematerialisation" of the economy, according to new research. This means the trend towards the value produced in our economies being embedded in computer memory or perhaps even biological memory rather than material things.

The important change in the big industrial countries is not best characterised by a switch from manufacturing to services or even from low to high technology. It is the switch from producing machine tools or even computers to creating software

Dematerialised economies are significantly different, argues Danny Quah, a researcher at the London School of Economics.* The difference is not just that ideas are more important or can be communicated more easily, for a great deal of technical change in the past has taken the form of a good idea that can be copied everywhere without becoming less useful to its originator. Mr Quah calls this property

It is conventional wisdom to Thomas Jefferson's definition: others of exclusive property, it is the action of the thinking servation that we therefore power called an idea, which an individual may exclusively possess as long as he keeps it to himself; but the moment it is divulged, it forces itself into the possession of everyone and the receiver can not dispossess himself of it. Its peculiar character too is that no one possesses the less because every other possesses the whole of it. He who receives an idea from me, receives instruction himself without lessening mine; as he who lights his taper at mine, receives light without darkening me." The difference in a dematerialised economy is that the products of the economy are infinitely expansible too. My use the dematerialised industries of a word-processing programme in the production of this newspaper does nothing to stop other people around the globe using the same software.

The same is true of a huge variety of products in the modern world – the content of an Oasis CD, the broadcast content of television signals, the information on the Bloomberg or Reuters system, any software, a Disney movie, and so on. Evi-

from the growth of trade and overseas investment 100 years ago. Trade is increasingly not the exchange of goods and services but their reproduction. The notion that a dematerialised economy is infinitely expansible has other fascinating implications. Clearly, markets are not local or national but universal: as we know well, there are no obvious boundaries to the market for Microsoft software or the Disney concept. Secondly, in the demateri-alised industries there are no significant initial capital costs of the sort it took to create General Motors. One person and a computer is enough to start. Thirdly, using dematerialised products often involves what economists call "network externalities". This means that if enough people use one product

-say Windows95 on their PC it will grow in popularity simply because everyone uses it, even if experts think another product - such as the Apple system is better.

Econo- Policy Research looks at the mists have already analysed the economic implications of a sub-"superstar" phenomenon. Peo-ple are paid hugely more than others doing almost indistinguishable work when they corner a significant market share. It is Placido Domingo's success that makes fans want to listen stardom. For another, network externalities make it easier to corner the market. These explain how Bill Gates could progress from his computer in a garage to become a billionaire whose software is used on a majority of the world's PCs.

A second new paper also explores how information technology can explain the phe-nomenon of growing income er for the Centre for Economic ject widely studied in manage-ment texts: the demise of corporate hierarchies in favour of delayered and empowered companies.

Just as the technology of mass production led to the assembly line and its management hierarchy, information technology has led to a characteristic organisation the authors call the "holistic" company.

It has come about because there are increasing synergies between tasks thanks to computers. It is easier for one person to take an order, arrange delivery and send out a bill than to have separate departments and much better for the customer. Or for a factory worker running computerised machin-ery to improve the design of the product

Holistic companies therefore need workers who are well-educated and versatile rather than ones who have been trained to do specific tasks.
These broadly skilled people are in high demand and their wages have risen relative to those with outdated single skills. Indeed, the authors argue that there is a segment of unemployable people stuck at the bot-tom of the labour market.

Their analysis suggests that part of the trend to greater in-equality could be reversed by ef-fective education and training. Finland (71-85)

We could try to produce a welleducated and versatile workforce of people who would be well-suited to switching from one task to another.

This corresponds to the call for "security of employability" put forward by Joseph Stiglitz. chairman of President Clinton's Council of Economic Advisers, at the jobs summit in Lille. It has been pounced on by politicians of all shades as a path out of the forest of job insecurity.

It does point, however, to the need for an updated liberal education that will produce well-rounded young workers.
Giving preference to vocational training which tries to pick spe-cific skills that might be needed in the economy in 10 years and could become swiftly outdated would be a mistake. There is one final point to emerge from these new analyses. They confirm that the consensus in the economics profession is settling on technology as the cause of greater income inequality in the industrial economies - and not trade with cheap labour third world coun-

^a Verdict is open on 10 deaths

The eight runners in the Free Handicap at Newmarket were supposed to be the focus yesterday, but instead thoughts returned to the 10 who lost their lives at the Cheltenham Festival last month as the Jockey Club published its report into the unusually high number of fatalities at National Hunt's showpiece meeting. Those who expected easy answers, however, will find only disappoint-

The 10 equine deaths at this year's Festival represented 2.7 per cent of the 364 runners, against an average for the previous 10 years of 0.952 per cent. Despite this sudden increase, though, the Racecourse Department's report concludes that "no single factor, or indeed combination of factors, is to blame for the fatalities".

The Jockey Chib's inspectors watched video recordings of all 10 incidents, and consulted trainers, jockeys, vets and the RSPCA. While no obvious common factor was identified, a number of points will be given further consideration, including starting procedures, the effect of modern training techniques, the use of roving television cameras near the running rail, and the wearing of fluorescent jackets by course officials.

the airship providing a novel

camera angle for Channel 4 might have been a distraction for horses. No jockeys noticed its presence, but it was certainly a constant irritant for many racegoers throughout the Festival, and its future use must now be in considerable doubt.

The comments of Bernard Donigan, of the RSPCA, sum up the report's findings. "We've left nothing to chance," he said, "Cheltenham has done everything possible and you can't criticise them." The conclusion seems to be that fatalities are a fact of life at the Festival, and that this year's casualty rate was simply an unfortunate statisti-cal blip. We can only hope that this attitude will not appear hopelessly complacent in the aftermath of Cheltenham 1997.

The first task for Nick Lees, Newmarket's clerk of the course, yesterday was probably to track down his Christmas card list and put a thick line through the Jockey Club's Racecourse Department. The Cheltenham post mortem was a considerable distraction from Newmarket's upbeat disclosure that, with barely a fortnight to go before the first Classics, a sponsor has been found to subsidise both the

1,000 and 2,000 Guineas. Pertemps, who also stepped in at the last minute to support the St Leger last year, will in-tially back the Classics on a oneoff basis, but have been offered Some trainers also felt that an option on both races, and the Jockey Club Stakes on the first day of the Guineas meeting, for a further two years.

This news will not be of significant interest to the connections of Cayman Kai, yesterday's Free Handicap winner, who is not entered for the 2,000 Guineas. A Group Two winner over the minimum trip last year, Cayman Kai was thought unlikely to get a mile this season, but after showing an impressive turn of foot to overtake Projection and World Premier, he was showing no sign of stopping after yesterday's seven furlongs.

Regiment will go to the Guineas from his yard with a serious chance, but the trainer will be chewing the carpet if either of yesterday's placed runners takes the colts' Classic. Not that the bookmakers think it is likely: World Premier is 50-1 (from 100-1) with William Hill, the same mark occupied by Projection and Tumbleweed Ridge, unplaced despite starting jointfavourite vesterday.

If anyone can pull off a startling result, though, Clive Brit-

Hannon bravely claimed that tain, World Premier's trainer, is top of the list of suspects. He proved it once again in the Earl Of Sefton Stakes, as the 14-1 chance Luso held the challenge of Smart Alec, who was sent off favourite at 6-4 on the basis of effusive praise from the spies on Luca Cumani s gallops. Never one to set his sights too low, Brittain nominated the 1997 Dubai World Cup as a long-term target. Game though Luso may be, he is unlikely to force Cigar's connections on to

Heavy fall for O'Gorman

Emma O'Gorman, the country's leading female Flat jockey, was taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital in Cambridge yesterday evening after a horrific fall from Simply Times in the penultimate race at Newmarket.

O'Gorman lay motionless, attended by paramedics, before being lifted into an ambulance. Racegoers feared the worst for her mount when attendants placed screens around Simply

"Emma was conscious and can feel her arms and legs so that has to be a good sign," Bill O'Gorman, her father and Sim-

the best two-year-old he has ever trained and now comes the test to see if the colt can elevate himself to the station of some of Hern's other Classic winners, Brigadier Gerard, Nashwan, and Troy.

Minutiae means much where a champion juvenile is concerned and the prosaic conversation in Lambourn this spring has concerned how much Alhaarth has grown over the winter. Not much seems to be the simple answer, but Hern remains convinced that his horse has developed in other direc-

This afternoon's field may be small but it will satisfy the purists because as well as Alhaarth, last year's Dewhurst Stakes victor, it also features Beauchamp King, who won the other great test of juvenile ability, the Racing Post Trophy. That renewal, though, looked the lowest calibre for several

A third name to toss into the stew is Pommard, who has not achieved great heights on form but who has been incomparable conversation in 1 ket's watering holes this last fortnight. However, the recent fortunes of his trainer, John Gosden, suggest there may be a flat black cat on the drive at Stanley House. Alhaarth (3.40)

has to be the selection. The preceding Feilden Stakes contains no fewer than eight entries for the Derby. Heron Island will be well fancied as he carries the daunting mantle of being Peter Chapple-Hyam's Epsom horse, but the winner may be produced by a man who has Derby candidates like frog spawn in his yard this season. Henry Cecil bas made a hugely successful start to the campaign and is represented here by Storm Trooper (next best 3.05), one of many talented animals he sent up the Polytrack gallop on Warren Hill early yesterday morning be-fore the hooded eyes of several pale pressmen. It is a measure of the battalion at Warren Place that Storm Trooper is considered some way behind the vanguard. There are warmer words for Tenby's brother Bright Water (who runs at Newbury on Saturday), Silver Dome (an entry for Sandown's Classic Trial) and a colt who may mature into the best of the lot, Commander In Chief's halfbrother, Dushyantor. Yesterday's results, page 27

Niarchos tribute

Henry Cecil, who trained for Stavros Niarchos, the shipping magnate who died on Monday at the age of 86, yesterday paid his tributes. "He was a very good and loyal owner," Cecil said. "This is sad news indeed." Obituary, page 18

NEWMARKET 2.35: Jackson Hill, who made a big moression when win ing on his seasonal return, will be hard to beat but faces another progressive sort in SE-LECT FEW. His trainer, Luca Cumani, believes this 10 furlong trip will suit his charge ideally.

3.48: ALHAARTH, unbeaten in five starts last year - including a com-fortable triumph over Rio Duvida in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster - will be hard to beat. He was also an impressive 21/2 lengths victor over Danehill Dancer - through whom Polaris Flight is held - in fast time in the Dewhurst Stakes here last October. Racing Post Trophy winner Beaucharup King has more to do here while Sandown maiden winner Pommard takes a big step up in class.

4.10: MUTADARRA, a short-head second of 21 to yesterday's European Free Handicap runner-up, Projec-tion, in a six furlong maiden here last October, is bred to stay further and can take this on her way to better things. Hammerstein, a son of Kris out of the 1989 1.000 Guineas winner Musical Bliss, was a creditable 10 lengths fourth to Mons in Ascot's Group 2 Royal Lodge Stakes last September over a mile and might find this trip a bit too sharp.

Three times successful last year, the last victory being in a Goodwood Listed race, he may just need this run but is very much one to watch. The same is true of $1 Mawes, a seven-furlong winner at Salisbury and very spoutly bred. Tewfoll had Weet-A-Mawte well back in third when wirring at Chester in August at a highly promising that to Mark of Esteem at Goodwood. He too is bred for middle distances. FORM GUIDE

Alberth cannot be opposed on the form book, having carried all before him last year, culminating in an impressive Dewhurst Stakes win over seven furlongs here. He has strengthened in the 2,000 Guineas betring throughout the winter and will be a short price here. This race was chosen as Alharith's target due to the lively testing ground at Newbury, but there is rain forecast here as well. In addition, connections have suggested that the run will bring him on and the fact that he does only just anough in his home work leads me to take a chance on IBIO DUVEDA. Devid Loder's Sales colt may have been slightly Extend to run Almarith to half a length at Doncaster, but he showed what a smart performer he is by winning the valuable 30-currier Talmarsals Houghton Sales Stokes here afterwards and does get 5th from the favourite (he received 4th at Doncaster). Racing Post Triphy winner Beauchastop Ning is nearest of these walls to Almarith in Guineas betring and a win for Storm Troopsy second to him at Accust last year, would be a boost to his chance. A line through Danehill Dancer, winner of the National Stakes at the Curregh, appears to give Polarita Flight planty to find with Almarith, while Sandown maiden winner Possmand, well backed for the 2,000 Guineas in recent weeks, is taking a big step up in class and has plerity to prove in this class.

Mutadara was well backed before finding Projection (Free Handlago number-up yesterday) just too good in a 21-tunner medicin here in Octuber, so another market move would be significant. Luca Cumani has had good things to say about Pagham, so he too cannot be discounted in a root that is say to be very informative.

FARMANA ran every with a Nottingham handicap on his reappearance last week, scoring by eight lengths from her 15 hvals. The Payruz filly was a course and distance winner last year after an encouraging Yarmouth debut second to Tamhid in a conditions race. Farhana seems better on softer ground, so she runs only if there is rain, if she does take part, the 7th pensity should not stop her winning. Night Parade, numer-up in the Thetford Stakes on this card last year, went on to win by three lengths at Chester but was well beaten in three runs in Group races afterwards. He is interesting in a handicap off an official mark of 90. Doctraik Amatina, placed in maidens at Lacester and Newceste et two, was beaten a length and three-quarters by Waypoint (sec 5th) when long odds-on at Lingfield (7f AW) lest month. Birds of a feather plot London Marathon triumph much during her running career. but in the last year she has achieved something rare indeed - persuading Liz McColgan to change her mind. The 31-year-old Scotswoman - always determined, sometimes dour-will toe the line in the Flora London Marathon on Sunday a far more relaxed and confident athlete than she was a year ago thanks to Waitz's intercession. Soon after the last London Marathon, where she finished

Grete Waitz accomplished fifth, McColgan wrote to the legendary Norwegian - twice a winner in London, nine times in New York - to take her up on an offer she had made to coach her. Waitz, who now lives in Gainesville, Florida, noticed Mc-Colgan while the Scotswoman was training there in the winter before the 1994 race. "When I saw her I just shook my head," Waitz said yesterday. "She was running 140 miles a week and she looked tired all the time, I told her I didn't want to interfere, but if she wanted my advice or my help, I was available."

À few months later, after finishing a far from happy fifth in London, McColgan wrote to the Norwegian. It was not easy for her to do. "Grete has always been an idol of mine." McColgan said.
"Even though I'd won the world title and everything, to go up and talk to someone you had looked up to all your life - it was quite an intimidating feeling."

She has not regretted her decision. Since linking up with to go back to the type of training she did five or six years ago. We speak the same language. I have been where Liz is. I tell Liz. Thave done the mistakes for you so you don't have to do them.' My biggest problem was to convince her she should have some easy days in her training. Sometimes she has tried to do it a little bit her way and a little bit mine and I have not been happy with that. So I said either

It is very, very difficult to get someone you can talk to and has the same ideas as yourself," Mc-Colgan said. "Grete and myself are on the same wavelength. The biggest problem I had when I was self-trained was that I would tend to be too hard on myself. With Grete I have more confidence about easing back. I trust her judgement.

"If I had not met Grete when I did I would probably have just run myself into the ground. I was and still hitting my head against the wall, not getting the performances I should have done."

and B

Both are confident that Sunday could mark an end to that sequence. "When I see what Liz is doing in training and look at what I did I don't see any reason why she can't run as fast as I did or even faster," Waitz said. With the marathon, anything can happen on the day. But based on her training, she

Roe on the attack over Masters slur

Mark Roe has rebuffed the suggestion that he "stormed" out of Augusta after missing the half-way cut in the US Masters last week.

The Sheffield player, in France for the Cannes Open starting at Royal Mougins today. is angry about speculation which implied he might not be invited back to the Masters following comments he made about the course.

"I didn't storm out at all." said Roe, who had rounds of 74 and 79 on his debut in the event. "What I did say was that I didn't put the course in my top 20. It's too short for that and the only way they have to defend it is to trick up the greens. But I loved the place. The atmosphere is terrific and I had a great week."

Roe was level-par after 16 holes of the first round, but then had a double-bogey at the 17th and the following day, needing a 72 to survive, ran into a succession of problems. They do not appear to have followed him

Only three of the 12 Europeans who were at Augusta have flown to Cannes - and, like Roe. David Gilford and Costantino Rocca, also missed the cut. Gilford's early exit was the more surprising since he matched Nick Faldo's opening round of 69. Whereas Faldo added a 67 and went on to record his remarkable victory. however, Gilford shot a second-

"I started bogey-bogey and just couldn't get back into it," said the 30-year-old, who is looking for his first victory since the 1994 European Open.

The drama of Faldo's tri-

"Ev: ybody says their goal for the year is to win one tourna-ment. Well, what's wrong with saying you want to win eight?"
the 28-year-old said. "It seems like a nice number.

Baker beat Faldo with a playoff eagle at the 1988 Benson and Hedges International and Faldo himself said at the time: "This is the star we've been waiting for." Only in 1993 did the Wolverhampion player live up to that billing. He won twice and was an outstanding performer at the Ryder Cup at The Belfry. But he has not lifted a trophy since.

"I don't think that what Faldo said has been a burden for me to carry," he said. "This is my 10th year on Tour and hopefully I've still got at least another 10 to umph over Greg Norman may come. I'm still very ambitious."

Botham braced for defeat

Ian Botnam has prepared himself for disappointment in the race to become an England selector. The former all-rounder has attracted some support in his bid to join Ray Illingworth's panel, but the indications last night were that he will not win first or second of the eight can-

The result will be announced at Lord's today, but Botham said vesterday: "I'm a betting man, and to be honest. I wouldn't lay too much on my chances." And, anticipating a disappointing result, he added: "I'll be back next year and the next and the one after that if Illingworth is unlikely to be too pleased if that prediction proves accurate. Graveney was enough votes to finish either set to stand against Illingworth as chairman just a few weeks ago until the Cricketers' Association - for whom he is chief executive - told him to withdraw, citing a clash of interests.

world to witness the deed itself in the Bradley Center in Milwaukee. And the night's appointed heroes did not disappoint. With an 86-80 victory over the Bucks, the Chicago Bulls on Tuesday became the first NBA team to amass 70 wins in a regular season, along the way staking their claim to be the best basketball team in history. In the end though, it was all rather routine, a less than scintillating day at the office. When the deed was done, Michael Jordan and the rest presented their coaches with cigars. But in his moment of triumph the man who has eclipsed Al Capone and Mayor Daley as the most famous Chicagoan in history sounded less euphoric than relieved. Maybe that was because

A Chicago TV station sent a had the Bulls reaching inside news crew up in a helicopter themselves a little. At halfto broadcast live the team's bus time Milwaukee led by 49-40. as it made the 90-mile drive In the closing minutes Jordan north to the game, while 500 had hoped to be on the bench reporters, no less, showed up savouring the hosannas of his Chicago in the NBA brute strength but, NBA from across America and the nation. Instead, with 16 seconds to go, he was on court blocking a three-point attempt that would have brought the Bucks to within one. But then Steve Kerr, the two converted penalty throws brought the final margin back to six points. "I guess we did enough, but we were a little lacklustre," Jordan said afterwards. "We've rewritten history, but now the play-offs and the pressure really start. I'd give these 70 wins for the championship."

Such modesty, however, is probably superfluous. After a two-year hiatus while Jordan worked out a premature midlife crisis playing indifferent minor league baseball in Birmingham, Alabama, the natural order of the NBA universe has been restored. In othprayer of stopping the Bulls, champions in 1991, 1992 and 1993, winning yet another crown in 1996? And, it must now be asked, are they the best NBA team ever? The answer to the first question is almost certainly, no. The Bulls have not lost more than once to any rival this season. Conceivably, a team or a scor-er on a white-hot night could beat them in one, possibly two games in the play-offs - but not in a best-of-seven series. Compared to a Bulls failure, Greg Norman's collapse in the Masters on Sunday would seem as routine as a swoon at a teenage dancing party.

But are they the best of all time - better say, than Wilt Chamberlain's LA Lakers of the early 1970s, whose record of 69-13 in 1971-72 fell to the the Bucks' gritty performance er words, has anyone got a Bulls on Tuesday? Certainly Contrary to what many experts team than the three-times champions of earlier this decade. Jordan himself may have lost a shade of speed and er, craftier player than before, and a better leader than ever. He is also incidentally still good enough to take his eighth career league scoring title by a street, averaging 30.6 points a game, against 27.0 for his nearest rival. Haieem Olaiuwon of the Houston Rockets, the current usurpers on the NBA throne. The chemistry is marvellous too. At the highest echelon, Jordan and All-Star point guard Scottie Pippen work better together than ever. The talents of Dennis Rodman, basketball's foul-mouthed, orange-haired, all-over tattooed bad boy, have been successfully harnessed - though Rodman did miss six games for butting a referee earlier this year. But the Bulls took that deprivation in their stride.

At least as much as the trio of mega-stars, the heroes of the season have been the likes of Randy Brown, James Edwards, and Luc Longley - hardly jour-neymen of their sport, but not household names either. All have exhibited that astonishing single-mindedness of purpose: "We deserve to win 70," Pippen said at the weekend, "because we've been so focused for every single game."

But the best in history? The question is no more answerable than whether Louis would have beaten Ali, or Bobby Jones have defeated Jack Nicklaus. The game has changed, argues the Cleveland Cavaliers coach, Mike Fratello, "but I can attest to their greatness." Pippen makes the same point. "I don't think you can compare teams with the 1970s, but for anyone 20 years old or so, they can look at us and say we're the best basketball team they've ever seen."

Silverstone yesterday unveiled plans to make itself the pernament home of the British Grand Prix. The Northamptonshire circuit has already se-cured the rights to the British race until 2001, but the owners believe that they can ensure it

Work has been done on the track itself to increase speed and safety following advice given by the drivers after last year's race. The industrial estate which is housed in the 800acre site will also be expanded to create a race technology

The owners are also hopeful that Jackie Stewart will base his new Formula One team at the circuit when his Ford-backed team begins racing in Formula One next year.

The chronic traffic congestion which also affects the British Grand Prix each year could also be eased by the end of the century, with plans to link the M40 and M1 motorways with a dual carriageway. Rival tracks Brands Hatch and Donington - which have both previously staged grands prix - are faced with very large costs to meet new safety standards should they want to mount a challenge to SilverSir: Well done the RFU! After Cliff Brittle's appointment in finding, consultation and negotiation, it was right to "draw a line in the sand". Rugby union is living in difficult and dangerous times and Steve Bale tells us a sorry tale of strident arrogance, personal vilification and greed by the "top clubs". The self-interested blusterings of Sir John Hall and EPRUC do not seem to me to be the best way forward for the wider game. Their demands that the RFU must "surrender reminds me of a mob ranting "Wadder we want? Money! When do we want it? Now!".

Bordeaux and Bayern reach final

Football

Bordeaux will face Bayern Munich next month after completing an 18-match campaign to reach the Uefa Cup final. The unfancied French side, lying 15th in their domestic league. sealed a 2-0 aggregate semi-fi-nal victory over Slavia Prague with a 1-0 home victory on Tuesday. They began their European quest in the much-maligned Intertor. Cup nine months ago.

Their victory ended an 18year gap since the last French team reached the Uefa final -Bastia in 1978 - after striker Didier Tholot scored the 46th-minute winner. The match failed to reach the heights of Bordeaux's stunning favourites to reach the final af-3-0 quarter-final win over Milan, after they lost the first leg 2-0 in Italy, but the French club in Germany but Mehmet Scholl set up Bayern for the vital were rarely troubled by the Czechs on the way to their first European final. The Bordeaux coach, Gernot Rohr, said: "It may not have been as thrilling as our match with Milan but it was more important because it has put us into the final. Now I believe we can win the trophy. Dutch midfielder Richard Witschge said reaching the final was the end of a long road. "In all, we've beaten 11 teams to get this far. I would never have thought that possible,"

Despite a team boasting three exceptionally talented players in midfielder Zinedine Zidane, striker Christophe Dugarry and defender Bixente Lizarazu, all prime targets for foreign teams, including Arsenal, it can be no surprise the team have been unable to hit the heights on all fronts. League form has undoubtedly suffered though the club president, Alain

Afflelou, will hear none of it. "I know a lot of coaches were against entering the Intertoto Cup because they thought it would cut short players holidays and damage preseason preparations," he said.

But I saw it as a reprieve for a team which had narrowly missed out on a Uefa Cup place. In the end, we only cut short bolidays by three days and. instead of playing friendly matches, we were playing official games.

"Now I see lots of coaches from teams in mid-table are starting to talk about qualifying for the Intertoto Cup." If Bordeaux have their name champions, it will all be con-sidered worth it but, curiously, they will not go down as Inter

Substitute Ivan de la Peña scored a consolation goal for Barcelona two minutes from time as his side tried desperately to force extra time.

The arrival of De la Peña in the final minutes changed the ne in which Barcelona had badly missed the Romanian playmaker Gheorghe Hagi, who was out with injury.

Without a natural set-piece specialist, the Barcelona coach, Johan Crayff, turned to Hagi's compatriot Gheorghe Popescu to take a series of dangerous free-kicks that the Spaniards forced in the opening 15 minutes But neither Popescu nor the Bosnian striker Meho Kodro, who was twice guilty of wasting passes after being put through by Jordi Cruyff, could make the best of Barcelona's early dominance.

Bayern's victory, which followed last week's Spanish Cup final extra-time defeat against Atletico Madrid and a disappointing draw against Racing Santander over the weekend to lose ground in the title race, also ended Barcelona's unbeaten home record this season to complete their miserable week.

But Cruyff remained philosophical, claiming: "We have to be happy - you have to play well to be still playing the competiinscribed as 1996 Uefa Cup tions at the end of the season." against Sheffield Eagles.

count against him in the future." However, Ferguson's withdrawal will leave a bitter taste in the mouth, coming as it did 24 hours after Alan Shearer revealed he would have a hernia operation and still return to play for England

Royle attempted to calm the troubled waters by contacting Brown directly, but the feeling in Scotland will still be anti-Everton. Royle recently joked that he was trying to talk Ferguson out of the Euro 96 finals. That caused a storm and yesterday's developments will have fuelled Scottish displeasure. Ferguson has been plagued by hernia problems for more than a year. He had an operation in time to play as a substitute in the FA Cup final, but needed further surgery at the start of the season.

Speight fighting fit for Sussex

Martin Speight, of Sussex, yes-terday declared himself fully fit for the new season after missing the whole of last sum-mer with post-viral fatigue syndrome.

The 28-year-old batsman has successfully rebuilt his fitness during six months in New Zealand and will play in Sussex's opening Benson and Hedges Cup match against Gloucestershire at Bristol next week.

Speight lost over a stone in weight with the virus, which affects the muscles and joints, but said that his winter trip had gone so well that a specialist's check was not required.

"There were some dark days last season but after a full winter to test my fitness I feel fine and am ready to go," he said.
"After the effects of playing in just one second XI game last season I knew that I had to concentrate on getting completely right for this year, and it's worked out well. "I felt fine during the whole of my time in New Zealand when I batted a lot for a side in the Wellington competi-tion, kept wicket and also coached Speight is delighted to be making a comeback under the former West Indies captain Desmond Haynes, who has tak-en over as Sussex's new firstteam coach. "Desmond has got everybody relaxed, he wants us to enjoy our cricket without feeling weighed down and the mood in the camp is excellent, he said.

Sussex have not won a trophy for nine years, but Speight says dwelling on their winless run only creates pressure. "I don't even think about it. Desmond believes success will come if we relax and play our natural game. He wants to bring on the best aspects of our cricket and I cer-tainly won't be curbing my attacking instincts."

Haynes said: "A full season from Martin should make a big difference to our batting lineup, which was very inconsistent last year. I knew from my time at Middlesex that Martin was respected and bowlers such as Angus Fraser didn't always enjoy facing him, as on his day he can take any attack apart." Lancashire are to give a firstclass debut to South Africa's Steve Elworthy in the three-day friendly against Yorkshire at Okt Trafford, which starts today. Elworthy, a 31-year-old allrounder from Transvaal signed to replace Wasim Akram, is named in a 13-man squad.

Lancashire are without Mike Watkinson, Jason Gallian, John Crawley and Glen Chapple, who are all included in The Rest to play England A at Chelmsford on Saturday. Mike Atherton will captain the side in the absence of Watkinson while the youngsters Andrew Flintoff, Richard Green and Darren Shadford are in contention for a place. University matches, page 26

Faced with yet another cause of controversy with its clubs, the Rughy Football Union yesterday acceded to indignant - and very belated – demands from its Pilk-ington Cup finalist clubs for a big-ger share of the £1.2m proceeds. Rather than have Bath and Leicester boycott the match in-

After the week it has just had a breakdown of its relationship both with its own senior clubs, who have announced their withdrawal from cup and league next season, and its neighbouring unions, which are scarcely a fortnight away. As it it was overshadowed. Telephone negotiations be-tween Tony Hallett, the evermore harassed RFU secretary, and Peter Wheeler, Leicester's chief executive, carried on even while yesterday's announcement was being made. "We were concerned about the income we were going to get considering the large administrative costs we have incurred selling tickets," Wheeler said. "Having spoken to Tony Hallett, I'm happy that they are now looking at ways of bringing about a fair amount of revenue for the competing finalists." Leicester have sold £300,000worth of tickets for the final, which has been a sell-out since before the quarter-finals, and feel entitled to some recom-pense. Until five years ago, clubs received a commission of 10 per cent on ticket sales.

This year's finalists' share-out four per cent of the gate less the RFU's 15 per cent management fee plus other expenses - was agreed by the clubs before the start of the season, which makes it invidious for Bath and Leicester to start complaining now when the final is Pilkington's renewed backing has occurred against an uneas backdrop, since as things stand neither Leicester nor Bath nor any other members of England's club élite intend participating. Hallett, however, ventures to suggest they will. "We do need every now and again a bit of good news," he said. "We believe there is no intention whatsoever to leave the Pilkington Cup."

head of corporate affairs, added: "The last thing I want to do is get involved in RFU politics but it is quite clear from our actions that we see a great future for this competition." Whether this turns out to be the case will not be resolved this week, because Cliff Brittle, chairman of the RFU, will not meet club representatives until next week at the earliest.

By then he will no longer be able to assert, as he has, that English Professional Rugby Union Clubs Ltd (Epruc) does not or cannot speak for the clubs with whom the union is at loggerheads. Yesterday the 20 chairmen of the First and Second Division collectively sent a letter to Twickenham that left по опе in any doubt.
